Among Unitarians there are many very earnest people, devoted members of our churches, who are such because they found deliverance from doctrines in which they had been brought up, and which were only a burden to them and a darkening of their religious life. In the Unitarian's simple trust in God, as heavenly Father, and in humble discipleship to Jesus, they found a joy and strength and a freedom of spirit never known before. They have become enthusiastic Unitarians. Knowing what such doctrines have been in their own lives, they are eager for others to share the great happiness and privilege of their faith. It makes them long to see the church in which they have found a spiritual home prosperous and popular. They believe in its reforming mission in the world. And even while its influence remains small and its adherents few, nothing can daunt their courage and persistence. They are confident that the future will be theirs, and they stand unflinchingly by the truth which has possessed their lives, and are ready to suffer for it popular disesteem and social disadvantage. In the old days they would have gone to the stake rather than renounce their allegiance.

But with all sympathy and admiration for such a spirit, it has to be remembered that the means must not be mistaken for the end, and the danger must be avoided of regarding the propagation of doctrine as the end for which a church exists. It cannot be denied that the "loyal Unitarian" may become a merely argumentative, if not quarrelsome person, forgetful of the deeper issues of life, the graces of a lowly discipleship, and the charity which is greatest of all. While eagerness for truth is a noble and salutary passion, if it leads to a conception of religion as a matter merely of intellectual concern, the result is mischievous in the extreme, and may be most dreary and disastrous in its effect upon the life of a church. Re-adjustment of doctrine is often essential to the progress of true religious life, and that is why our churches must be free, that there may always be an open way for the Spirit to lead into all truth; but a church that tries to live on any doctrinal propaganda is doomed to disappointment and decay.

Re-adjustment of doctrine is the means, which must in the present time as much as ever be faithfully pursued, but means to the end of the soul's true life with God. And it is in that conception of the meaning and purpose of a church that we must find our deliverance from all despondency, and our strength and joy in service, even if the outward conditions should seem to be ignoble and unlovely, or the whole world should seem to be against us.

When this is fully realised it must be to us a source of strength and gladness and thankfulness. If we are united in the fellowship of any one of our churches, even the humblest and most isolated, where numbers may be very few, yet in freedom of the Spirit and in loyalty to truth, then nothing can hinder our peace or turn us aside from persistent faithfulness; for we are surrendered to God, who is the strength of those who put their trust in Him. We are surrendered to Him in the lowly spirit of worship. There is the secret of our joy and strength, for we are in His hands, to be used in His service, even the poorest and lowliest, rich in His benediction; and the church is His, not our own. The worship must be a constant gladness, even if only two or three come together, for it is in spirit and in truth; no matter even if it be with little knowledge, yet all to which a humble faithfulness has been able to attain,—our present truth, held not in dogmatism, but as the only possible expression for us, until clearer light shall dawn, of a true religious life. The popular Churches of the land may look disdainfully upon us, and argue that the truth is not in us, because we are so few; but that cannot trouble those who know in whom they trust, whose loyalty to truth is simply a surrender of themselves to God and to the guidance of His spirit.

That is the gate by which we enter into peace, and into the deeper joy of our life with God. For there is much more given to us in the fellowship of such a church, and much more to which we are called in the appointed service of lowly children of the Father in heaven. Supposing there is only the humblest meeting place and no means to secure a regular minister; yet two or three faithful souls may meet together for a quiet hour of worship, to read together some good book, to teach a few children, to do in secret some act of kindness. These are all the elements of a living church, with rich supplies of joy and strength and divine peace for each faithful member. The world may despise—but there is worship and sincere aspiration and service of the world's needs. Hunger for righteousness, yearning for the salvation of souls, and for the coming of the Kingdom—all may be there, and it is the faithless heart that asks for more than God will give. So then even in the poorest and most isolated of our churches, there need be no discouragement if only there is that true surrender of spirit, and a clear grasp of the great ideal. Out of such simple elements may be built up all that they need for the truest service, and for an abundant harvest of the spirit, in love, joy, and peace.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The hundred and second annual meeting of this Association was held on Tuesday at Derby. A meeting of the ministers and delegates of the associated congregations was held in the morning in the schoolroom of the Friar-gate Chapel, Mr. J. C. Warren in the chair, after which a Conference was held, at which a paper was read by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., of Mansfield, on "Idolatry of Doctrine." In the absence of the President, Mr. Franklin Winser, J.P., who was unhappily detained at Nottingham by illness in his family, the chair was taken by the Rev. John Birks.

The following is the first part of Mr. Fripp's paper, with a summary of the rest:—

IDOLATRY OF DOCTRINE.

A great danger in our Free Churches, especially in their present disorganised condition, is their readiness to yield to the passing Zeitgeist, and to lose touch with the wisdom and devotion of the ages. Illustrations of this are conspicuous in individual congregations, but we scarcely realise, I think, how as a body we have suffered from it, and how, at the present time, we have been invaded, ministers and people, to our serious loss, by the nineteenth-century craving for knowledge.

When the history of this century is written it will be a story of remarkable intellectual progress. We have had a hundred years of mental energising—of research, criticism, discovery, and ingenuity. Our modern life is full of it. Commerce, politics, literature, art, medicine, our very recreations are characterised by their intellectuality. We have become, to a large extent, a nation of analysts and mechanics, delighting in knowledge and the application of knowledge to the supply of physical wants. We study matter and motion, examine structures, dissect bodies, photograph diseases, probe into origins, philosophise over bones, talk through wires and walk on wheels, and are ever on the lookout for some means of doing by machinery what has hitherto been done by hand. To be intelligent and to contrive are the chief requisites of our civilisation, and their results are our great triumphs. Whatever spiritual and poetic influences have been at work among us are altogether secondary to science and engineering. Evolution and bacteriology, Röntgen rays, telegraphs and telephones, railways, bicycles, and steel bridges are the peculiar nineteenth-century achievements.

I suppose we do not object to these things. I certainly do not—least of all to the bicycle! I have just made a journey of 350 miles on a bicycle, which I enjoyed very much. Yet, I will confess, it made one critical. By chance I found myself almost alternately in industrial and cathedral cities, and I was impressed by the odd way in which the cathedral religion jostled with the industrial intellectualism. Derby, Burton, Birmingham, Bristol, and Swindon offered abundant evidence of the intelligising I speak of. Whatever in these towns is beautiful, homely, and restful, is in the old quarters or the suburbs. The desire of their people is obviously to escape from them as early and as far as possible. But what I saw in abbey or minster at Lichfield, Tewkesbury, Gloucester and Salisbury, seemed to me remote and powerless to grapple with the evils of our commercialism. The two elements simply clash, and are hopelessly inconsistent with one another.

And what of ourselves?

There has been a dream in our Free Churches—the only churches in the land free both to keep the good of the old and follow the good of the new—that they might have formed the centre of a Liberal Religion capable of bringing some harmony among these discordancies. Who should help to rationalise faith on the one hand, and to spiritualise thought on the other, if not people who had inherited unsectarian traditions—a people who had their beginning in an unwilling Nonconformity, and a desire to put religion above mere differences of theology, "to imprint," says Baxter, "true Catholicism on the minds of Christians"? This was our task, our clear duty laid upon us by the Will of God as different from all other Churches. But we know how this duty has been unfulfilled, how our congregations have gradually lost hold upon the religious life of the country, many of them being scattered through indifference, or settling down into dull little companies of the learned and respectable.

What has been the cause of it?

Well, it seems to me that the chief cause, the one cause above others, has been our steady surrender to the modern intellectualism. We are suffering from pride of knowledge. Like the nation, we worship the understanding. We believe in forward movements in thought, in criticism of the Pentateuch and the Gospels, in the distribution of the Revised Version, in lectures on history and doctrine, in postal missions, in salvation by books. We believe in saving the world by books—though men and women, I think, are getting tired of the flood of printed matter which besieges them; by awakening intelligence and imparting information, when the world needs justice and pity and a clean, honest heart, when many people, weary of thinking, brain-sick with new knowledge, begin to say, "I want to be ignorant again; I want to be simple and lowly like a little child; I want to be good; give me love and help me to pray."

I do not for a moment say that we love knowledge only; but I am convinced that it is what we as a body have cared most about. Our services and conferences and organisations bear witness to it. Our worship is generally an introduction to the sermon. We are afraid of feeling. The singing and responding in our churches is often miserable. It is almost the mark of a Unitarian that he cannot or will not sing—a proof to me that there is something wrong with Unitarianism. The keynote of our sermons is modern thought. Our perpetual boast is Truth. "What I care for," said a leading Unitarian to me lately, "above everything, is the truth." I am afraid he expressed the general opinion.

Yet one grain of love is worth all the truth in the world. The tree of knowledge is not the tree of life. And sometimes it is the tree of death.

Yet, to add to our troubles, Mr. Hargrove comes home from America in hot haste to recant his old unsectarianism and blow the Unitarian trumpet. "We have not been Unitarian enough," he cries. "Away with Free Christianity and Liberal religion, and Undenominationalism, and other vague weak things. Let us follow our brethren in the United States and have a definitely Unitarian flag, and a definitely Unitarian church organisation, and make it our chief work as ministers to Unitarianise the world." And while he proclaims this evangel, he is joined by no less a veteran than Mr. Clayden, once a co-worker with Dr. Martineau for inclusiveness and catholicity, who now declares that he repents, that America has taught him a more excellent way, and that he is a Free Christian no more.

When I read these communications in The Inquirer I could scarcely believe my eyes. I thought that I must have been on the sea instead of these gentlemen. But if it must be so, let it be so. Two more good men have gone wrong, and I am very sorry for it. I regret that a voyage across the Atlantic should have such baneful effects, and I trust it will never be my lot to travel six or seven thousand miles to shake my nerves and my principles. Yet I think the winds and waves, and the blaze of American hospitality, would have to make me very dizzy in the head ere I would join a church or an association limited to Unitarians. I doubt whether twenty visits to the States would persuade me to put on Unitarian fetters and bind myself to drag about with me, as my mark and sign, the corpse of an ancient controversy.

I may be somewhat prejudiced, but just now America is hardly the country I would go to for spiritual edification. It is, indeed, a wonderful country, and it has already bestowed great gifts upon the race. It has given us a Declaration of Independence, and fought a war for the abolition of slavery. It has produced a Channing, an Emerson, a Henry George, and a Phillips Brooks. But at the present time, so far as I can make out from its politics and literature, the highest benefit it can confer on the European nations is the terrible warning of its example. Surely, if one country beyond the rest is afflicted with the disease of Intellectualism it is the United States. We may see there, as no where else, the results of the modern "'cuteness" which is making England commonplace and vulgar. Huge railway-stations, vast hotels, mammoth steel-bridges are a poor exchange for Windsor Castle and Westminster Abbey. It is a dismal prospect. When I think of advertisements on Niagara, pirated and debauched editions of Ruskin, quack medicines and religions, Mormonism and lynching, oil-trusts, iron monopolies, wheat-corners, railway-kings and Tammany Hall—well, my hope of the Americans is that as they are nearest to social perdition they are, perhaps, nearest to repentance!

But there is no note of penitence in Mr. Hargrove and Mr. Clayden. On the contrary, they come with laudation and defiance. They are on the war-path. They have joined the men at Essex Hall who have been trying for years to make us all utter the Unitarian shibboleth, who are bent on making our Free Churches Unitarian churches and compelling those of us who cannot accept Unitarianism to leave their communion. It is quite possible they may succeed; but I for one will not go without a struggle, and I hope I shall be forgiven for saying frankly what I think of the doctrine or group of doctrines to which we are to be expected to subscribe.

Having referred to Mr. Hargrove's story of the little girl at Montreal who did not know what the word "Unitarian" meant, Mr. Fripp said that the word "Christian" he knew as one of the sacred words of all civilised tongues. The word "Free" was English and homely, and "Liberal" was now English and a noble word associated with liberty and the results of liberty. But Unitarian had something learned and outlandish about it. It was pedantic, cold, unbending and incapable of glowing or stooping to common humanity. But even if they could get over its forbidding appearance there was little compensation to be found in the thing itself. Expand the word to the utmost, cram it, like a Gladstone bag, with new meaning, yet they could never make it not a negation. It expressed an attitude of hostility to a venerable doctrine of Christendom, which, however insufficient or superstitious, was a living and potent belief in some of the greatest periods of Church history.

A little sympathy would discover in that doctrine a sincere attempt to express the mystery of the Godhead and the divine suffering and self-sacrifice, living verities which alone satisfied the religious needs of mankind. A religion without mystery was not worth a straw, but Unitarianism abhorred a mystery, it liked everything clear cut. They had done well to expose the mysteries of darkness, to denounce superstition and priestcraft, to destroy credulity, to show the unreality of historical mysteries. They had cleared away the unreality which had gathered about the person of Christ, and distorted the features of patriarch and prophet. But of the mysteries of light they said little or nothing—the real deep infinite mysteries of existence, of creation, of life, of the soul, and of God. Miracles had not ceased, they were wrought daily in the outward universe, and in man's heart. The operations of God's spirit, His power over sinners, His redeeming mercies on hardened souls, the forgiveness of sins, the strength of duty, the rest and peace of faith—those things were beyond the understanding and past finding out. Of those things Unitarians said very little. Channing and Martineau spoke of them, but the real interpreters and disciples of those spiritual teachers seemed to him chiefly outside the Unitarian ranks. Mr. Fripp then spoke briefly of the truth of the Divine Sacrifice, which was foreign even to Channing and Martineau, but added that it was a subject which must be developed on another occasion. In conclusion, he repeated his contention that their Free Churches were suffering from Intellectualism, and said that as ministers of the Gospel their work was to see and prophesy and bless. Their eyes and hearts must be open to God. They must see and enjoy and lead others to rejoicing. They must contemplate and pray, and must spread the spirit of contemplation and prayer. Their message must be homely yet beautiful, simple and easy to understand, and yet wonderful and infinite.

In the discussion which followed, the Rev. E. R. Hodges said that he did not think they were suffering from too much intellect; there was in their body a great deal of quiet religious life.

The Rev. J. K. Smith said that he delighted in the name Unitarian. If Unitarianism was intellectual, it lay at the centre of manhood; man could only be religious because he was intellectual. Unitarianism had sprung originally from the denial of a prevalent doctrine, but now it stood for the truth of Unity in all creation.

The Rev. J. Page Hopps spoke humorously of the blessings that had come to him since he grew deaf; it had meant to him a renewal of youth and the possibility of sound sleep. But from the little he had heard of Mr. Fripp's paper he drew a lesson of tolerance of every variety of conviction in their fellowship.

The Rev. Ambrose Bennett said that he thought Mr. Fripp had put his finger on certain blots in the general attitude of their Free Churches, of which he had singled out "Intellectualism." But for himself he was not prepared to accept the antithesis between knowledge and pity, love and truth; they would get into a misleading position if too much stress was laid on such an antithesis. They must draw a distinction between conceiving religion in terms of knowledge and having the love of knowledge. They said their churches had an intellectual view of religion, but he did not find in those churches a great abundance of thought. Where theology was burning with life, kindling the thought of the best men to new interpretations of old truths, was not among them. They must not belittle knowledge or the service of the intellect; but to get it properly valued they must have that which was before knowledge—they must have real religious experience. Things must live before they can be rightly interpreted. Their great need was to understand what was meant in religion by revelation. When they spoke of revelation they usually understood something revealed to the intellect, definitions of God in terms of knowledge not necessarily bearing on the will or life; but revelation in religion must be regarded and interpreted as redemption. If they could see that the only purpose for which God revealed Himself was to redeem, to deliver man from the world of sin, then they would get religion out of the merely intellectual rut, and there would be living strength in it.

Mr. Wibberley said that the Unitarian name in which he had rejoiced for over a quarter of a century had never deprived him of any freedom of thought.

Mr. J. C. Warren said they could not separate their intellectual from their spiritual life. They would none of them wish their chapels to be stereotyped as Unitarian or to destroy their free trusts; but the vast majority of their members at the present time were Unitarians. He thought ministers made a mistake in being troubled about the name.

The Rev. H. Gow said that as a people they had not been moulded by the name they bore, and the people would not be altered by a change of the word. Mr. Fripp, with characteristic exaggeration, had, he thought, rightly described their people, and it might open their eyes to the danger from which they suffered.

The Rev. W. Whitaker said that the real power of the paper was not in its harping on the word Unitarian, but in the religious feeling thrown into it. They were familiar with several antitheses such as Mr. Fripp had put before them. The great lesson they had to learn at the present time was that of comprehensiveness. Unity in diversity must be their ideal.

The Rev. W. Lindsay said that at such Conferences they wanted papers to help them to get to the spiritual element in their religious life.

A cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Fripp, moved from the chair, closed the proceedings.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After lunch the business meeting was held, Mr. W. Evans, of Leicester, in the chair. The roll was called by the Rev. H. Gow, the secretary, who also read the reports from the churches of the district.

Mr. B. Dowson, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which, beginning with a balance of £26 4s. 10d. in hand, showed receipts amounting to £116 13s. 6d. from subscriptions, £50 14s. 7d. from chapel collections, and a total, including grants of £138 from the B. and F.U.A., and a legacy of £50 from the late Mr. Wragg, of Chesterfield, of £480 0s. 5d. The year closed with a balance of £21 10s. 7d. in hand.

The report of the Committee referred to the many ministerial changes of the year. The Rev. E. I. Fripp was welcomed on his return to his old pulpit at Mansfield, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas to the High Pavement, Nottingham. The loss sustained by the removal of the Rev. A. Bennett from Chesterfield, the Rev. H. E. Haycock from Loughborough, and the Rev. E. A. Maley from Ilkeston was also recorded. More money had been spent and more work had been done than in recent years. The services held at Burton had shown some promise, and it was hoped that at Boston a minister might soon be appointed. The suggested appointment of a missionary minister, to have special charge of Ilkeston and Burton, would meet a real need, and the Committee hoped that the need would call forth both the money and the man.

On the motion of the Rev. E. I. Fripp, seconded by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, the reports were adopted, and on the motion of the Rev. A. Bennett, seconded by Mr. W. Moss, J.P., the officers were re-appointed.

A welcome having been accorded to the Rev. V. D. Davis as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and to the Rev. J. Page Hopps, a discussion ensued on the following resolution, moved by Mr. R. Briggs, and seconded by the Rev. J. K. Smith:—

That we, the delegates and friends of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, in Conference assembled, agree to appoint a District Missionary, whese duty shall be to assist in the general organisation of the smaller and weaker churches connected with the North Midland Association, and also help in the propagation of our principles in any large centres where our Committee may think desirable.

The resolution was carried, with only one dissentient, and a vote of thanks to the Derby friends for their hospitality, moved by Miss M. C. Gittins, brought the meeting to a close. The attendance, owing to the General Election, was smaller than usual.

THE EVENING SERVICE,

After tea a religious service was held in the Friar-gate Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. Taking texts from the first and last books of the Bible, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," "Behold, I make all things new," Mr. Hopps spoke of the new conception of Theism to which they were brought at the end of the present century, by the wonderful development of knowledge of the universe. It was, he said, the most vital question of the age how to harmonise belief in God with the thought of the universe which presents it as a unity, as a manifestation of one ever-present Power in every atom of its substance and mode of its life. Modern thought and discovery in science and philosophy had entirely shifted the centre of gravity. Science in its effort to reach the fountain of all life took them into the Unseen. It did not end with crude matter. The ultimate atom, or that which was just beyond it, appeared to be not matter at all, but a throb of force. In the beginning was the Word, they said. In the beginning was the thrill, said science; and they appeared to mean the same thing. The secret of life and form was in emanation from the unseen ocean of limitless power. So they reached that ether of which science told them, penetrating and pervading everything, a subtle spirit, which at every instant made matter possible, and out of which on the higher planes thought and imagination came. Hence psychology was destined to be the master and interpreter of all sciences. The Unseen was not a Hereafter, but a Herein. Behind all manifestation was life; behind all matter, spirit; behind man, what they called God. So they came to a vast conception of Unity, the conception of a living Universe, intelligent in every part, from mineral to man; and they passed from the transitory to the eternal. The Eternal Spirit was in that body of Nature. God was well indicated by the phrase "the Eternal not ourselves which makes for righteousness"; but no less truly they could say, "the Eternal not ourselves which makes for beauty, or culture, or electricity, or love, or anything else that Evolution meant. God was the real substance, the Source of all life, the condition of all law, the assurance of all progress. Therein they saw the meaning of the word Father as applied to Him. Evil was inseparable from creation by evolution; it was either good on pilgrimage, or a perverted form of life, probably self-adjusting. The failure of man to reach the highest was not a thwarting of God, only a thwarting for a time of man. In the light of such thought of God the old creeds fell away; they understood man, revelation, miracle and the spiritual world. All things were made new.

The second part of Professor Peabody's sermon on "The Church of the Spirit" we regret to be obliged to hold over until next week.

To Correspondents.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—E. H. C.; F. E. C.; A. H.; C. J. H.; E. R. H.; J. M. K.; E. W. L.; H. J. M. (thanks); J.E.J.; C. R.; E. S.; A.W. UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

Address by Rev. Principal Gordon, M.A., on the "Tercentennial of a Name."

The new Session was opened on Wednesday with an address by the Principal in the Memorial Hall. Mr. James R. Beard, J.P., President, occupied the chair, and briefly introduced the object of the meeting. He then called upon the Rev. Principal Gordon to deliver his address.

Principal Gordon prefaced his Address with some learned remarks as to how our English chronology was fixed, stating that the present century would not end until Dec. 31 next. The year in which we are now assembled happens to be the Tercentennial of the first known appearance of the Unitarian name; and the very month coincides. How the term Unitarian originated we may conjecture, but we do not know. In vain do we search for it, til we come across a decree of the Transylvanian Diet at Lécsfalva, in October, 1600, when Unitaria Religio (the Unitarian religion) was first recognised as such. I do not think that the Unitarian name was devised by its friends; they certainly did not readily or rapidly adopt it. It was deliberately intended to bring the reformers of Christendom and the followers of Mohammed under a common term of reproach. Certainly, at a later date we find it in customary use as the received translation of the Arabic Muahid; and as such it crops up in our own literature, in Gibbon's pages, in Wesley's well-known intercessory hymn, and more recently in one of Pusey's treatises. Be all this as it may, there came a time when the Unitarian name was first tentatively, then formally, adopted by our Hungarian brethren as their official style and title. I first find it in the official records of their mother-church, at Kolozsvar, in 1637. Next year (1638) it took the public and authoritative position among them, which it has ever since retained.

The year 1638 is a memorable date in the history of two Churches of our own faith—the Church of Poland and the Church of Hungary. It carries very different associations in the two cases. In Poland, 1638 was virtually the year of doom; in Hungary, 1638 was practically the year of establishment. The key to the rise, as well as to the fall, of the Church in Poland is to be found in the fact that its history is the record of one long-continued struggle with the Jesuits. But for the intrigues which began with the arrival of the Jesuits in Poland in 1558, the anti-Trinitarian section of Protestants would not have been forced into separation, as the Minor Church, in 1565. The Polish Church never adopted the Anti-trinitarian designation. Along with a firm adhesion to the supremacy of the Father, it cherished the adoration of our Lord, on grounds not very dissimilar to those in which Roman Catholics defend the adoration of our Lady. In 1569 a Polish noble, John Siennynski, for the improvement of his estate, laid out the plans for a new town which he called Rakow. He had become a Calvinist, but he invited settlers of every sect to the free exercise of their own religion. Perhaps this was due to the fact that his wife was already in strong sympathy with the Anti-trinitarian movement. Among the first to seize the opportunity was a little band of Anti-trinitarians, led by one of the most remarkable men of his day, Gregory Pauli, originally a Calvinist. His ideas of reform were not merely theological, but social and economic as well. He died in 1591. Eight years later, a strong effort was made by public conference to wean the Anti-trinitarians of Raków from the error of their ways, but the discussion had an unexpected result. James Siennynski, son of Raków's founder, joined the Minor Church in 1600. In 1602 he established a famous college there. Teachers of eminence and liberality were brought together from various parts of Europe; scholars rapidly poured in, and it was no uncommon thing during thirty-six years for the college roll to include a thousand names, three hundred of them representing the flower of the Polish aristocracy.

Needless to say, the Jesuit gaze was fixed upon it with enmity, and longing for some means of compassing its downfall. In 1638 two thoughtless lads flung pebbles at a wayside crucifix of wood, doing it some damage. Their parents soundly chastised them. But the matter was brought before the Diet at Warsaw, and urged as involving the whole community in a heinous crime. On the roof of the great hall, in what is now the Governor's official residence, Kielçe, a contemporary painting by Dolabella, the Court painter, represents the sitting of the Diet. On May Day, 1638, the decree was passed, proscribing the teachers of Raków confiscating its church and its printing press, and dooming its college to demolition. In 1660 our Polish co-religionists were compelled either to renounce their religion or to become exiles from their homes.

The Hungarian Church had wavered more than once between alternatives of framing a policy of its own, or following in the wake of the Church of Poland—a Church which certainly took the lead in learning and culture, perhaps also in wealth. Daniel Beke was elected Bishop of the Hungarian Church in 1636, and at a Synod convened by him in 1638, the Unitarians achieved a united front, presented a common confession, and obtained from the Diet, under a Calvinistic Prince, the ratification of their place among the received religions of the country. Never since then has this position been questioned, even in the bitterest times of persecution. At this point appears, for the first time in history, a document with the heading, Confessio Fidei Secundum Unitarios. Yet it was not from Hungary that the bequest of the year 1600 came to Western Europe, and reached our own shores. By a strange irony of fate, we have derived the Unitarian name from the exiled Poles who never, even in exile, adopted it as their own. Andrew Wiszowaty, the grandson of Socinus, rallied the fugitives from Raków in 1638, and, after many heroic endeavours on their behalf, piloted to Holland the main body of them in 1660. Obtaining the willing services of a learned printer at Amsterdam, he projected in 1665 the series of Latin folios which were intended to secure for his faith, through the press, a hearing denied to it from the pulpit. On the general title-page the series is described as the Library of the Polish Brethren. Then come the words, added unquestionably by Stanislaus Lubieniecki, editor of the first volume of the series, quos Unitarios vocant, "called, by other, Unitarians." Both Wiszowaty and Lubieniecki would have preferred, as their writings show, phrases such as "simple Christians," "mere Christians," "Catholic Christians." In this they did but express the tenacious sentiment of the body they represented. Within the limits of that body, these phrases were perfectly intelligible; they meant not many things, but one thing. But in Holland the exiles had taken in hand the task of introducing the views of their representative men to a public. From that public they sought the justice of which they had at home been ruthlessly deprived. Hence they yielded so far to the teaching of events as, for literary purposes at any rate, to pay some heed to the lesson of Hungary.

Precisely similar in its motive was the first presentation of the term in English print—namely, in 1687, in the title of the "Brief History of the Unitarians, called also Socinians." It was to avoid the suspicion of a narrowness, applicable only to a school, that the name was adopted in England, which in Hungary had stood since 1600 for a religion, since 1638 for a church.

At the conclusion of his address the Principal announced that the Durning-Smith Scholarship had been awarded to Mr. Herbert McLachlan, and that Mr. Henry Dawtrey had passed the examination for the Gaskell Scholarship. He also announced the syllabus of work for the coming session. After a very hearty vote of thanks had been accorded to the Principal for his address, the meeting terminated.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

The position and prospects of the Unitarian or non-subscribing congregations in and about London at the close of the nineteenth century—that is my theme. But, first, let me say something about their past.

In the middle of the eighteenth century there were twenty-four of these congregations, most of them situated in the centre of the present city. During the latter half of that century the drift of population and other causes led to the extinction of about half their number. Another diminution in the same ratio occurred before 1850, and but for newly founded congregations, the roll would then have been small indeed. As it was, the old Presbyterian survivors had been supplemented by Theophilus Lindsey's church in Essex-street, and Vidler's in South-place (both founded last century); and by the churches at Little Portland-street (1824) and Brixton (1839). The roll also included another central congregation—at Clerkenwell—and a Domestic Mission Centre, now George's-row.

During the latter half-century, and especially in the last quarter, there has been a considerable addition to the number, in spite of the loss of several, such as the Clerkenwell congregation—extinct in the seventies—and that at South-place, which has become an Ethical Culture Society. Including the Croydon and Richmond congregations which arose from the labours of Londoners, and which are, indeed, sufficiently near the metropolis to be conveniently reckoned in, we find ourselves with thirty-one worshipping societies in all.*

Some of these are very small, and but poorly equipped; though the recently-raised fund will enable the district society to make great improvements in these respects. The Permanent Loan Fund which is now being organised will no doubt, be of great assistance to future congregations; but this is the only financial endowment—say £300 annually—which has accrued to the London movement as a whole, and the form of its application is limited, as its title shows. I believe but few of the separate congregations have any financial endowment.

The old central congregations have by this time mostly died, or moved out towards the suburbs. Little Portland-street is the only congregation in the West Central district (the Welsh services at Essex Hall hardly form an exception); and the George's-row Mission is the only congregation in the East Central district. Of the twenty new congregations added during the last fifty years, about three-fourths are north of the Thames. The new southerners are almost entirely the creation of the last twenty-five years.

The policy of planting-out in the suburbs was one that was urgently called for, unless dense masses of people were to be left in ignorance of our gospel. It has been pursued under many difficulties, and at an outlay considerable for us; and it has naturally had some failures. But, on the whole, it may be said that, where a persistent and generously supported effort has been made to found a new congregation, it has met with at least so much success as is represented by a permanent group of worshippers with a settled ministry, and with allied institutions carrying on a measure of benevolent and educational work.

There are some exceptions, and one of the problems of the new century will be how to prevent their recurrence. That with regard to the more desirable "residential" localities there is not any insuperable difficulty is shown by a sufficient number of instances. Given an efficient ministry and a fair measure of support in the early years, there seems no reason why a living congregation should not be gathered in any such neighbourhood. I am aware these postulates are not always granted, and the result is only as might be expected.

But the case is different with regard to the areas of population where "mean streets" abound. All denominations feel the difficulty. I believe that Mr. Charles Booth's new volume, which is to deal with religious agencies at work among the people of London, will considerably surprise a good many of our friends, by showing that it is by no means the unorthodox type of teacher alone who in the midst of the crowded districts is a voice crying in the desert. There is no comfort in this—except that we are not to think, when "success" is denied, that some calamity has befallen us that has not occurred to others; the question is how we or they may overcome the difficulty, and be true religious helpers of the toiling millions. It appears undeniable that the ordinary form of church organisation is a failure when this class of the population is considered. On the other hand the eleemosynary element in missions to the very poor renders that form of religious activity more than questionable when the great bulk of workpeople is in view. The crying need of the time is for a mission—better called by some other name—which will do on the part of the new faith what the friars did for the old, and what some exceptional men have in our own century done for the belated "orthodoxy" that is assuredly passing away. It is not a question of money, but of special personal genius.

Meanwhile it is no easy thing to maintain the churches, old or new, in other districts. I need not go into particular cases here. In regard to many of our congregations it must be confessed that their work is confined within a small compass, whether as regards the number of minds affected by their teachings, or comforted by their benevolence; and it is not with all of them a true excuse that the means at command are too scanty, unless among the means we include a clear perception of the demands of the church, and hearty and devout self-denial in fulfilling them. The amount of good work done in certain directions by some of our people and ministers is quite remarkable. The fact that these forms of useful activity are not superficially allied to the church must not blind our eyes to the truth, first, that they are really useful, and, secondly, that they rest upon the sense of duty fostered by the teachings with which our services render the workers familiar. In many branches of educational and philanthropic work our people are still singularly active, as of old. When they cease to be so, the glory will indeed be departed. Politics, national and civic, claim a large part of the time and the energy of others, and usually, if our congregations are not large they nevertheless include some of the foremost social reformers of the district. Reflecting on these things, so as to obtain a just view of the situation, one may say that there is real life, if not an abundance of it, amongst us.

We must not, however, let any reflections of the kind blind us. If our congregations are to live it must be as congregations, not as ghosts of them with lists of "known adherents," or "non-attending subscribers" somewhere in the rear. Few of our churches, I fear, are entitled to boast much of their normal condition. An intelligent stranger would not, as a rule, carry away the impression that here are a people caught up into a great strong current of life. I am not now charged with a discussion of the particular types of doctrine represented in our pulpits. Substantially, I believe them to be closely convergent towards the simplest and, as we believe, the most effective principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ. But if I had to report what I have seen as to the effects of types of doctrine, I could easily cite instances where the most "advanced" was as evidently dynamic as the most "conservative" could be, and no less easily where both "advanced" and "conservative" were equally ineffective. Churches live by the spirit, not by the letter.

It is the fate of all who engage seriously in the work of life to see those whom they have regarded as leaders and champions, one by one pass away, leaving behind them a void that nothing seems capable of filling. It was assuredly so in the times of our fathers, though we may forget it; and it is so in our times. Within the last decade or two we in London have witnessed the departure of a remarkable succession of men, whose character and ability would shed lustre on any movement with which they were connected. When only one such is taken from a little congregation the loss is felt severely; when it is a strong and gifted preacher who goes, or an inimitable writer, the feeling that naturally arises is one almost of despair. Where are the fine speakers, the brilliant writers, the ripe scholars—where the men of high social standing, of wide culture and ample fortune to match? Casting our glance along the obituaries of the past years one might easily justify such plaintive exclamations, and feel that it could not be that so many and so good could be taken and yet leave many and good behind.

But sensible as we must be of our losses, I for one refuse to admit that the abounding young life of which we have seen so much in London lately is anything but the brightest augury for the coming century. We have still with us men and women who will rank amongst the choicest models for another age; our ministerial ranks are nearly complete; and our community was never more united than now. I hope next year's meetings and services will effectually stimulate us to make the most of our resources. Arrangements are already contemplated which, if carried out as designed, will serve to summon and weld together our forces for efforts worthy of our cause. It will be well if in the weeks that remain of the old century we all become more sensible of the rich inheritance bequeathed to us by the good souls that have gone to rest, and hallow ourselves anew to serve God and man as fully as we can in our time.

"DUTY": A MUSING.

BY THE LATE ROBERT LEIGHTON.

I reach a duty, yet I do it not,
And therefore see no higher; but if done,
My view is brighten'd, and another spot
Seen on my moral sun.

For, be the duty high as angel's flight,
Fulfil it, and a higher will arise,
E'en from its ashes. Duty is infinite—
Receding as the skies.

And thus it is, the purest most deplore
Their want of purity. As fold by fold,
In duties done, falls from their eyes, the more
Of duty they behold.

Were it not wisdom, then, to close our eyes
On duties crowding only to appal?
No: Duty is our ladder to the skies,
And, climbing not, we fall.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

A number of Harvest Services are reported this week, and since our available space was exhausted, we have received further reports of similar services from Aberdare, Ainsworth, Stamford-street (Blackfriars), Chatham, Upperthorpe (Sheffield), Newark, Tamworth, and Walthamstow.

Atherton.—Since May last Chowbent Chapel has been more or less in the hands of decorators, carpenters, plumbers, glaziers, upholsterers, &c. The rich old oak remains untouched, but the chapel has been re-floored, new leaded windows of suitable tint have been put in throughout, new gasaliers fixed up, the vestry enlarged, and the main entrances to the chapel made more convenient. The choice decorations on walls and ceilings are in keeping with the old building. Two sons of a former minister (Dr. Harrison), namely, Messrs. John and G. Harrison, of London, have shown their affection for the old place by carpeting all the aisles and stairways with a moss-green patterned Brussels, which admirably matches the old dark oak. Mrs. Eckersley has recushioned the three pulpits and the Communion seats in rich plush. Mrs. Smith, of Victoria House, has presented a handsome flower vase for the communion table, the Ladies' Sewing Society have given enough to furnish the vestry and fit up the chapel vestibules, and the young people of the Sunday-school have presented a strong and beautiful folio edition of the Revised Version of the Bible, in large type, for use in the pulpit. On Sunday morning last, the many improvements in the chapel now being complete, the service and sermon were special to the occasion. Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., a member of the congregation, has offered to the chapel trustees a new organ. This generous gift was cordially accepted, and the new organ, which is to be worthy of the chapel, is now being built, and is expected to be ready in January.

Boston.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper, conducted the service in the Unitarian Chapel, Spain-lane, and preached an impressive sermon on "God's Guidance."

Chelmsford.—Harvest Festival Services were held on Sunday, the preacher being Mr. E. John Harry.

Crewkerne.—On Thursday, Sept. 20, the chapel, which has been closed for some weeks to enable the re-seating and renovation of the building to be carried out, was re-opened for public worship. The old-fashioned pews have been done away with. The new seats are in pitch pine, with choir stalls of the same material, close by the organ, which is now undergoing renovation and improvement. A new pulpit in pitch pine, and a new lobby have also been provided. The comfort of worshippers will be much enhanced by the wood block flooring now laid down, and improved heating apparatus. Another improvement is the colouring of the walls. The cost of the re-seating (£250) is being borne by Mr. W. Blake, of South Petherton. The cost of the other improvements (about £100) by Mr. E. J. Blake, of Crewkerne. There was a well-attended service in the afternoon, at which dedicatory prayers were offered. An appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, of Oxford, and other ministers taking part in the proceedings were the Revs. T. B. Broadrick, J. Worthington, E. Parry, A. Sutcliffe, and H. S. Solly. A public meeting was held in the evening, Mr. E. J. Blake in the chair. An interesting address was given by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol, on the subject of the freedom of the Unitarian faith. He said he rejoiced that the old days of misconception and of bitter feeling between different religious denominations were passing away. Although this old meeting-house stood before them in a new dress, it still represented the old convictions handed down to them through centuries. The Rev. J. E. Odgers touched on the history of Unitarianism in Crewkerne. Amongst the glorious band of ministers ejected through the Act of Uniformity was Mr. Tompkins, who ministered in that chapel for some time. James Stephenson, the ejected vicar of Martock, fled to Holland, and after qualifying there as a medical man, returned and practised here as such, also performing the duties of a minister. The chapel was put into trust in 1733, but he was inclined to believe there had been an earlier chapel. William Blake, the elder, became the minister in 1754, and after a service of forty-five years he was succeeded by William Blake the younger. The former was the great-grandfather of both the chairman and himself (the speaker). The latter died in 1821. To show the broadness of the views held by former ministers, Mr. Odgers remarked that William Blake, sen., was a Trinitarian, while his son was a definite and advanced Unitarian, and there was no reason to think that the former absolutely disapproved of his son's views. It was the duty of the congregation to keep unimpaired this freedom of thought. Other speakers followed, including Mr. C. Conway, of Ringwood, representing the Southern Association, and the Revs. J. Worthington and H. S. Solly. On Sunday, Sept. 23, the Rev. J. E. Odgers conducted services held to celebrate the anniversary of the Sunday-school.

Elland.—On Sunday last, Sept. 30, the Harvest Festival Services was held in Christ Church, the preacher being the Rev. James Taylor, minister of the church. The attendance in the afternoon was only moderate, but in the evening there was a large congregation, the church being nearly full. The church was very prettily decorated, and there was a good array of fruit and flowers. The receipts from collections and the sale of fruit, &c., amounted to about £3. A lecture by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, on "The Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau and some of its Lessons," announced for delivery on Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, is deferred to Oct. 23. The inaugural meeting of the Literary Guild and Social Union was held on Tuesday evening, Sept. 25, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Fletcher being host and hostess, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

Exeter.—The members of the George's Chapel Social Circle had the pleasure last Saturday of a visit from Miss Tagart. After tea Lady Bowring, who presided, explained that their circle had gladly accepted an invitation to affiliate with the Central Society in London. Miss Tagart then gave an address on the work of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union. They were, she said, doing pioneer missionary work. The reading circles in connection with the Postal Mission had exercised an enlightening influence, while the summer excursions, in which members of other churches took part, were a great success. By the loan of books to small town and village libraries much excellent educational work had been done, and gifts of books for this purpose would be gratefully appreciated. They did not set out to make converts, but what they wanted was to help people to lead a higher intellectual life and to make them better citizens.

Halstead.—A Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held on Sunday last, when Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., of London, occupied the pulpit. There was a good display of samples of corn, fruit, and other seasonable products of the district, tastefully arranged. The unusually large attendance was a cause of special gratification; and it was observed that many of the adults present were those who, in their childhood, had attended the once flourishing Sunday-school. Although the weather was wet, both the congregation and the collection were the largest that have been for many years. The services of the orchestral band, conducted by Mr. Finch, in leading the singing, and in playing selections of classical music as voluntaries, were much appreciated.

Ilkeston.—On Saturday, Sept. 22, on the eve of his leaving for Nantwich, the congregation made a farewell presentation to the Rev. E. A. Maley and Mrs. Maley, consisting of a handsome portmanteau, and a flower vase and glass. Mr. Shaw made the presentation, and the Revs. J. Birks and W. Lindsay expressed the sympathy of neighbouring ministers. Mr. Maley said that what attracted him to Nantwich was that they had a school. That was the great need of a church, and he urged them to do their best at Ilkeston to have one. The money spent on the chapel had all been raised, and they were free to start on the fresh effort. He asked them to remember, when their new minister came, that he was not their servant, he was God's servant. Their endeavour was not to proselytise, they stood for something freer and better, a home for those who could not be bound and tied by creeds. The cause they had was not their own little cause, it was God's great cause as represented there in the Unitarian body.

Liscard.—Anniversary services were held in the Memorial Church last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. James Crossley, of Birkenhead. The same special order of service was used as at the opening of the church last year.

London: Bermondsey.—After the quarterly social gathering of the Band of Hope on the 25th ult., a public meeting was held, at which a number of parents and friends were present. The President, Mr. J. C. Pain presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and F. Allen, and Mr. W. G. Dannell (of the Southwark Band of Hope Union). Twenty-six prizes were distributed by Mr. Edwards to members who had attended regularly since the beginning of the year. The Secretary, Mr. A. W. Harris, explained that it had been decided to award prizes at this meeting instead of at Christmas as usual, owing to the Band of Hope officers having received notice from the Church Committee that the church would probably be closed after Sept. 30; but as at the last moment they learnt that arrangements had been made for Mr. Edwards to take temporary oversight of the church, they were glad to be able to announce that meetings would be held as usual, at any rate for the present. Harvest Festival Services were held last Sunday and were very successful, in spite of the inclement weather. At the close of the services, which completed the temporary engagement of the Rev. D. Amos, he was warmly thanked for his services.

London: Stratford.—Harvest Festival Services were held on Sunday last, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who preached in the morning on "Lessons from the Harvest" and in the evening on "The Joy in the Harvest." The church was tastefully decorated with corn, fruit, flowers, and vegetables. The congregations were good, especially in the evening, when the church was comfortably filled. The singing of the hymns, led by the choir of the Young People's Guild, was heartily joined in by the congregation, besides which some anthems were well rendered by the choir.

Loughborough. — On Wednesday evening, Sept. 26, the members of the Victoria-street Church held a farewell soirée in the schoolroom, to publicly bid farewell to the Rev. H. E. Haycock, who is leaving Loughborough for Chester. In the course of the evening, Mr. Haycock was presented with a gold watch and chain from the members of the church, and an album from the teachers and scholars in the school. Mr. W. Moss, the Rev. H. Gow, B.A., and Mrs. Wright took part in the presentation. On the following Sunday Harvest and Farewell Services were held; in the evening the church was fairly well filled. Mr. Haycock, in an able discourse, made special reference to his eight years' ministry with this church, and at the close bade farewell to the members and friends.

Manchester: Strangeways.—The parents' annual party in connection with the Sunday-school was held on Wednesday evening, Sept. 26. The attendance was adversely affected by the wet weather and the preparations for the elections. After tea the Rev. W. R. Shanks, as chairman, addressed the meeting on the work of the past year and the prospects of the school. Songs and duets were agreeably rendered by members of the choir. The Rev. W. H. Burgess, B.A., of Accrington, gave an address, and presented over twenty certificates won by scholars at the recent M.D.S.S.A. examinations. A dramatic sketch, cleverly played by three members, brought the meeting to a close.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—In closing a sermon on "The Opportunities of Man," the preacher, the Rev. Frank Walters, said that the vanished days of a life of faithfulness could never perish, they became blessed memories, they entered into the character, they survived as divine influences. Referring to the death of the Rev. John Slater, Mr. Walters went on to say: My friends, these thoughts recall the memory of one who has just passed away, one very near and dear to so many members of this church. He was a child of our church; his earliest religious influences were received within these walls. Years ago he left us in the enthusiasm of youth to enter upon his life-work; he left his sanctuary where he had consecrated himself to God, to become a minister of religion and a faithful servant of Jesus Christ. Ever since the record of his life has been one of unremitting service and constant fidelity. In a course of simple, unostentatious labour he followed his Master, and devoted himself to the cause of that Gospel which was so dear to his heart. Just as he was entering upon the evening of his life, he has been suddenly called away—called from his earthly toil to his heavenly reward; and to this faithful minister of Christ, just as gladly as to the most renowned leader in the army of the living God will be given the welcome: "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord." At the conclusion of the sermon the "Dead March" was played on the organ, the congregation standing reverently in their places.

Richmond.—On Sunday next Harvest Thanksgiving Services. Offertories for Indian Famine Fund. At the morning service Protab Chunder Mozoomdar will preach.

The South Wales Unitarian Association.—The autumnal meetings of the above Association were held at Dowlais on 27th ult., when there was a fair muster of ministers. At 11 A.M. the ministers and delegates met, and several topics of interest were discussed. The question of the Ymofynydd (the Welsh "Inquirer") was brought forward, the editor, the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, having announced his intention of resigning his post at the end of the current year, a resolution was adopted unanimously, expressing the warmest thanks of the Association to Mr. Davies for his faithful services as editor during the long period of thirteen years. The Revs. David Evans and T. Arthur Thomas were then appointed to take Mr. Davies's place as joint editors, to commence with the new year. Reference was made to the heavy debts on several of our chapels. Some of the reports were sad in the extreme, the debts, like a nightmare, weighing down the spirits of the good people. The matter was regarded as urgent, and the hope was expressed that the Glamorganshire ministers would give their best attention at their next meeting. The due celebration of the advent of the New Century was touched upon, but nothing satisfactory was done. It is to be hoped that the question will not be allowed to drop, as it is not likely that any of us will have such a chance again. On Wednesday evening, after a Communion service, at which the Rev. John Davies, Altyplaca, officiated, two sermons were delivered, and on Thursday, at 2.30, two more, and two again at 6.30. The attendance on Wednesday was somewhat scanty, probably owing to the sudden downpour of rain, and the fact that a political meeting was held close by; but on Thursday the meetings were all that could be desired, and it is to be hoped the good seed soon will bear fruit a hundredfold.

Warwick.—On Sunday last, amid bright and tasteful decorations, the Harvest Festival was held in High-street Chapel, the minister, the Rev. A. M. Holden, preaching in the morning on "Joy" and in the evening on "Thankfulness," and suitable hymns, &c., being sung. Collections for the Indian Famine Brahmo Somaj Fund realised £3 9s. 4d.

Yeovil.—Last Sunday very successful Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held, showing that there are at length some signs of hopeful revival here. The chapel was most beautifully decorated, a few willing workers having been engaged in their task all through the previous week, with a result that would have surprised those who have known the building only under the cheerless and depressing circumstances that have too long distinguished its appearance. In the morning service was conducted by Mr. W. B. Matthews, of Bridport, who has now the place under his charge, and who has undertaken the journey thither nearly every Sunday since last February. In the evening the preacher was the Rev. H. S. Solly, of Bridport, whose father began his ministry here in the year 1840. Heavy rain had thinned the congregation in the morning, but it was fine at night, and the seats in the chapel were then well filled, and the special hymns were sung heartily and with good taste. On the following Monday evening a tea-party was held in the Victoria Room, at which Mr. Matthews was again present, and a very pleasant and encouraging evening was spent. It may interest Postal Mission workers to learn that an advertisement in Pullman's Weekly has lately brought a highly valued helper to our cause in Yeovil.

THE coming week is crowded with events of special interest to our people. On Monday the new session opens at Manchester College, Oxford, with an address by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, an old student, and a devoted friend of the College, for many years its lay-secretary, one in whom by heredity and by life-long conviction the spirit of the College may be said to be incarnate. On Tuesday evening is the first of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's lectures at Essex Hall, in the course on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century." On Wednesday the autumnal meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be held at Sheffield, followed on Thursday by the bi-centenary celebrations at the Upper Chapel. Particulars of these meetings will be found in another column, as also a further notice of Mr. Manning's history of the Upper Chapel, to which we referred last week. The overflowing hospitality of Sheffield, at the time of the National Conference meetings in 1897, is still fresh in our memory, and we trust that in the coming week there may be a great gathering of friends from many sides to enjoy a similar delightful experience, and to take part in celebrations of so much significance.

ONCE more the London Bazaar comes to the front, but only to make its last appearance, and then take its final farewell of friends, afar off and near at hand. It has been decided to have a clearance sale at Essex Hall, on Thursday, the 25th inst., of the various articles left over from the Great Bazaar in May. An opportunity will thus be afforded of purchasing Christmas presents in good time, as well as other things both useful and ornamental. Particulars of the sale will be found in the advertisement columns.

THE Rev. F. K. FREESTON began on Thursday evening at the Essex Church School-room a minister's class for religious instruction, which is to be continued weekly until Dec. 20, in preparation for a New Year's service of welcome into the church. The subjects to be dealt with each week are printed on a syllabus which may be had of Mr. Freeston, and we are requested to say that the class is freely open to young people (but it is not for children) who may wish to attend, even though quite unconnected with the church. The class meets at 8.15 P.M.

THE Stopford Brooke Lectureship at University College is to be inaugurated by a course of lectures to be delivered by Mr. Brooke himself, in the Botanical Theatre of the College, on Thursday evenings, at 8 o'clock, beginning with an inaugural lecture on Nov. 1, to be followed by four lectures on Robert Browning. A second course of five lectures on poets other than Browning and Tennyson (Clough, Arnold, Rossetti, Morris, &c.), between 1840 and 1890, will begin on Thursday, Jan. 31, 1901. The lectures will be freely open to the public by tickets, on which subscribers to the Lectureship Fund have a first claim. Applications for tickets, which are limited in number, must be made to the secretary at University College, marked "Stopford Brooke Lectures," and enclosing a stamped addressed envelope. Applications for the first course must be made not later than Monday next, Oct. 15.

A MEMORIAL to Ruskin was unveiled last Saturday at Friars' Crag on Derwentwater, a spot familiar to him from early childhood and remembered as the scene of the first deep impression he received of the beauty of Nature. The monument consists of a simple block of Borrowdale stone. On one side is the monogram of Christ enclosed in a circle, and the following inscription from the "Deucalion" :—

The spirit of God is around you in the air you breathe—His glory in the light you see, and in the fruitfulness of the earth and the joy of His creatures. He has written for you day by day His revelation, and he has granted you day by day your daily bread.

On the other side, looking across the lake, is a bronze medallion, by Signor Lucchési, representing Ruskin's face in profile, and as he was in his prime. The monument was unveiled by Mrs. Arthur Severn and an address was given by Canon Rawnsley on Ruskin's connection with Keswick and that part of the Lake country.

IN connection with the re-opening last Saturday of the Little Portland-street Chapel, the Rev. H. S. Perris, the present minister, has prepared a sketch of the history of the chapel, which was distributed to friends attending the service. The chapel was opened in May, 1833, by the Rev. Edward Tagart, minister of the congregation, which since 1824 had been worshipping in the proprietary chapel in York-street, St. James's, where the Rev. Stopford Brooke afterwards preached, before the Bedford Chapel days. Mr. Tagart's ministry was cut short in 1858 by his death at Brussels, on the return journey from a visit to the Unitarian churches of Hungary. To him succeeded the Revs. J. J. Tayler and James Martineau, whose joint-ministry, however, only lasted until the close of 1860, when Mr. Tayler, feeling the strain of extra work too great, was obliged to withdraw, and Dr. Martineau remained in sole charge until his retirement in 1872. In October, 1874, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, coming from Dukinfield, entered on his ministry, which he relinquished in 1897. Portraits of Dr. Martineau, Mr. Tagart, and Mr. Wicksteed are included in the pamphlet.

MR. PERRIS'S sketch opens with some interesting notes as to the condition of this country in the early days of the chapel, and the movements of thought then going on. He refers to the striking development of religious activity on distinctively Unitarian lines at the close of last century and during the first quarter of the present century. But it is a mistake to say of Dr. Priestley that he "organised strong Unitarian congregations" successively in Leeds, Birmingham, and Hackney. The old Nonconformist congregations were already there, eminently "respectable societies," which in those days was a term of high praise. They in turn welcomed Dr. Priestley as their minister, and welcomed his strong preaching of Unitarian Christianity. It is interesting to note that when in 1844 his congregation made a presentation of plate to Mr. Tagart as an expression of their sense of the value of his services, the inscription on the salver was written by Charles Dickens, who for some years was a member of the congregation. For the benefit of our younger readers we may add that Miss Tagart, now so well known as President of the Central Postal Mission, is a daughter of the former minister of Little Portland-street Chapel.

THE current number of the Atlantic Monthly, under the heading "Some Letters of Martineau," publishes ten letters of the greatest interest selected from the correspondence of Dr. Martineau with Mr. B. B. Wiley, of Chicago, a friend whom he never saw, but with whom he exchanged letters from time to time for thirty years. The first letter, dated from Scotland in September, 1862, is very characteristic of Dr. Martineau's readiness to meet every genuine appeal for sympathy. Mr. Wiley, writing as a stranger, had clearly made some intimate confidence, and had enclosed his photograph. To this the response is :—

In trusting me with so much of your inner life, you have said not enough of the outer to protect me from mistake about your proper style and title. I ask myself, as I look at your touching words and eyes so full of sorrowful wonder, Does he preach? Does anyone lay the Divine humanities so much to heart, who has not to speak of them, and bring them from their depths?" And yet again I think, "No, there is the free hand here—the flowing soul—that is not professional," and to this my hope inclines; for sympathy of lives dissimilar gives the deeper witness to their common truth and love; and I am always inclined—perversely enough, I daresay—to suspect my own thought, if none but the parsons say "Amen." Plainly, however, whether you are secular or whether you are spiritual, you have the manhood that unites and transcends them both; and so the old-fashioned "Mr." that symbolises this will do.

In sending his photograph also, in return for that of his new friend, Dr. Martineau contrasts it with the engraving from the portrait of 1846, and imagines his correspondent saying they bear the same relation to one another as the "Studies" to the "Endeavours," and he adds :—

In the interval not only have I grown elderly, but an increasing engagement with severe academic studies has worked the logical part of me too hard, and possibly turned it to the outside, both of the person and the speech. The inward identity, I believe, persists: in none of us does it really change; but to bring it freely and without measure to the surface may come to cost us more. It may be partly from this cause that I now wonder at my rashness in half promising a volume on the Ministry of Christ. But it is more, I think, because that divine life—like all things divine—cannot, to my present feeling, be truly rendered in treatment as regular and analytic as a book implies. It gleams on our purified vision in hints and streaks of beauty; and though these flow together into fragments of form not only distinct but unique, yet every attempt to complete them disappoints one, and produces a whole quite inadequate to the glory of its elements. So I begin to suppose that his personality is better left as one of those tender and holy mysteries that have power over us just because they represent, with the sweetest harmonies of our life, also the infinite silence in it that cannot be broken.

In a later passage in the same letter Martineau says, "Emerson himself I love and honour more than his books; though they, too, report a sweet and noble nature, that has cleared itself into a light serene and sublime by pure force of inward fidelity." And he refers to Emerson's "Conduct of Life," which he had just been reading, as rich in wisdom. Emerson's poetry, however, he finds a complete enigma.

THE next letter published is thirteen years later, and refers to Mr. Brooke Herford's settlement at Chicago, and his own relinquishment of preaching. He speaks of the pressure of unfinished designs, from which comes the impulse of diligence, which makes what is called "the repose of age" less and less possible to him. "I cannot hope," he says, "to do much toward arresting the tendency of the age to materialistic or idealistic scepticism; but it is something to put on record a different type of thought in readiness for a time when the tide shall turn." Two years later, on Dec. 20, 1877, after Mrs. Martineau's death, he writes :—

The year that is closing has been the saddest of my life, and leaves me the survivor of a companionship most entire in thought and reflection from betrothal in 1822 to death last month. A blessing thus prolonged I cannot be so faithless as to turn from gratitude into complaint. If I step into a darkened path I carry with me a blessed light of memory which gives at least a "gloaming" though the sun is set, and promises a dawn when the night is gone. The short vigil will soon be over; and while it lasts, neither the departed nor the lingerer can quit the keeping of the Everlasting Love.

THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE, who has been staying at Aviemore, broke his journey home at Glasgow, and on Sunday morning preached in Trinity Congregational Church to a crowded congregation. The sermon was on "The Holidays of the Soul," and had for text (Mark vi. 31) "Come ye yourselves into a desert place apart and rest awhile." At the evening service, when Dr. Hunter preached to young men and women, Mr. Brooke read the Lessons and pronounced the Benediction.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is on "The True Patriot." The text is Deut. xx. 3, and the conclusion as follows :—

If we love our country truly, we shall not dare usurp the impious phrase, 'My country right or wrong'—with God or against God, approved of mankind or execrated! We shall be fearful lest she put herself in the wrong; we shall be jealous for her honour; we shall covet for her the world's admiration; we shall feel, as if it were directed against our own selves, the hatred and abuse of foreign nations. We shall be ambitious for England—not that her empire may be still wider, her forces by land and sea yet mightier, that the dread of her may be upon all the earth—it is not these which we shall desire for her, for other great nations have had all these and have perished—but rather that she should stand approved in the sight of God and man, that hers should be the glory of righteousness, the supremacy of reasonableness and goodwill. The patriot is not a man who extols, nor is he one who blames his country. He is patriot, and he only, who loves—above gain, and above kin, and above praise, and self—the land which gave him birth.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

II.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

"After describing the splendour and imposing effect of the Romish Mass, performed as he (Sir T. F. Buxton) saw it by His Holiness the Pope himself, he says 'yet as to any real worship in spirit and in truth, I set down in my mind 40 to 1 in favour of Plaistow Meeting.' . . . Why should such a man, a staunch Churchman, writing to his own son, also a Churchman, leap over his own Church, and make the comparison with a poor, often silent, Quaker Meeting?" *

Whether Buxton was right or wrong in his estimate, the words quoted from him in the above passage are typical of a strong (though often distant) admiration for Quakerism, which is very general. But in our days this admiration frequently sinks into a lament that the strange but staunch little community that once did such great things has lost its special power, that it has no longer its old individuality, that it is even dying out.

Several changes have taken place which give colour to this view. Formerly the Quaker and Quakeress were easily identified, now they are not. Their dress has no longer either the unvarying old-fashioned cut, or the meek sobriety of hue, which still distinguished it not many years ago. Also, in general intercourse the "plain language" is rarely to be heard. In other points more important than these, Friends have come into conformity with the ways of "the world." Pianos are to be found in their homes, music is systematically taught in their schools, some of them dance and go to theatres. All this has made the Quaker and Quakeress outwardly much more like other men and women than they used to be, but it is apt to give the ordinary observer an exaggerated impression with regard to deeper changes. It is true that deeper changes have taken place, not without numerical loss to the body. The adoption of the world's ways, and the freer social intercourse resulting from it, have given an entrance to new intellectual and religious influences which (reinforced in many instances by considerations of other kinds) have caused many secessions —chiefly to Anglicanism and Unitarianism. Owing to these influences from without and some from within—especially the formerly rigid rule of "disownment" for marrying out of the Society—there was at one period of the century a considerable and very ominous decline in the membership. But of late the tide has set the other way, and during last year there was a net gain of 121. The source of this gain is a matter of great interest. It lies in the Adult School work of the Society. The story of the beginning of that work by Joseph Sturge in Birmingham is as follows:—

In the year 1845 he was talking with a few young friends on the deplorable scenes observable in large towns on Sunday mornings—unwashed laziness lounging in narrow streets, troops of boys making mischief with trees, hedgerows and fences, or playing at "pitch and hustle" in the out-skirts—and expressed a regret that Sunday-schools commonly turned their scholars adrift at the ripest age for folly and vice. Could not something be done to mitigate the evil? The question was not asked in vain; the young Friends present were willing to try. Thus began the Adult Sabbath School of Birmingham, conducted by the younger members of the Society of Friends.*

Joseph Sturge continued to father the institution to the end of his life in 1859, and it grew rapidly, not only in Birmingham, but also in other towns. At the present time over 27,000 men and women attend the Friends' Sunday-schools, besides 13,000 children. Thus there are more than two scholars to every member of the Society, the present membership being roughly 17,000. There is no work undertaken by Friends which gives them so much hope, and which is so well worth the study of outsiders. Some of the difficulties which others give up as intractable seem to have been overcome. At the very outset what to most of us are moral impossibilities were achieved. What more difficult than to get anyone to anything early on Sunday morning? When the Birmingham Friends started their School, they fixed 7.30 as the hour for it, and yet men and women came. It seems to have been on the teachers' side that this hour was first found to be inconvenient; some of them were assistants and apprentices and could not get breakfast before coming to the school. Joseph Sturge met the difficulty by providing breakfast near the school at 7 o'clock, a plan which is continued in a developed form at the present day. Then there seems to be something in this movement which fits it in a peculiar degree to do what the ordinary Church services largely fail to do—namely, interest working men in religion. The "Pleasant Sunday afternoon" is something analogous in other Churches, and its success probably depends chiefly upon the same cause—namely, the need of some kind of meeting freer than the ordinary "service," and allowing simpler and directer relations between teacher and learner. Again, the absolutely democratic system of the Quakers, their immunity from all suspicion of the taint of clericalism and ulterior end, has given them a great advantage in this sphere of work; and it must be confessed that by their really brotherly spirit the advantage is nobly used. But whatever be the secret of their influence they have come to feel that they may, and ought to, use their advantage to its full extent by strengthening to the utmost degree possible the bonds between the Adult Schools and their Society, for mutual support.† They are now possessed with something of their ancient belief in a universal mission for their principles. They find that the working people who attend their schools appreciate these principles; all hesitancy in proclaiming them is vanishing; and, though new difficulties are arising from the new life, yet there is a spirit of earnestness which belongs to the hope of a great future. In thus attaining to a clear consciousness of the significance and the possibilities of the Adult School movement, Friends not only have reached a turning-point in their own history, but also are materially helping to bring to a turning-point the whole social body. In Sheffield 20 per cent. of the present membership of the meeting is drawn from the Adult Schools.* From Birmingham and its neighbourhood similar facts might be quoted. But these are precisely the places where Friends are making the most strenuous efforts to elevate the people, and especially to bring different social ranks together and promote mutual understanding and good feeling. This is really the central point in that complex thing, "the social problem." And, if Friends are going to work at it with that quiet and tactful but unyielding and unswerving energy which they brought to the Anti-Slavery and the Peace movements, we may be sure the results will be great. They were, as Henry Richard said, "the soul and sinew of the Anti-Slavery Enterprise."† "You peace people," wrote Cobden with regard to Quaker activity against the war spirit in 1848, "seem to be the only men who have the courage just now to call a public meeting. I always say that there is more real pluck in the ranks of the Quakers than in all our regiments of redcoats."‡

There is now a revival of this spirit which is due to direct contact with "the masses"; and though the falling off of some of the rich and the loss of the great orator John Bright have diminished the éclat of Quakerism, the work done may be no less valuable.

But within the Society of Friends, as in other religious bodies, there is a conflict of tendencies which forms an important part of its history. Three points may be specified. The doctrine of the Spirit leads some towards Quietism; others towards all good enterprise; some towards still self-absorption; others towards ardent universal benevolence. The finest types of Friend, such as Joseph Sturge, are unsurpassed examples of the reconcilement of these opposites. But the fact that Joseph Sturge himself received many warnings and rebukes from his brethren on account of his innumerable social and political activities illustrates the conflict spoken of. The conflict is going on still. At the Manchester Conference in 1895 it was pointed out how few Friends are active in Local Government affairs — Poor Law work, County Council work, &c.—and one speaker bade his brethren beware of the "danger lest they should be repelled by the rough-and-tumble characteristics of life, and, leaving outward wrongs to right themselves, retire into the silent life—a silence which may so easily become the silence of sloth and selfishness."

Another kind of conflict has arisen from the Adult School movement itself. The religious societies before referred to as springing from these schools have been constitutionally free from the control of the Society, though guided by individual Friends. They have used this freedom in choosing their methods; and thus singing, regular Bible reading and prepared addresses have become more or less customary in their worship. Some Friends have discouraged and resisted all this from the first. But the younger and more active, who are the leading workers, have held on their way, and, having the key to the future of the Society in their hands, and being earnest to use it, they are too great a power to be withstood. They are prevailing. And their work and experience outside the ordinary meeting are reacting upon the meeting itself. In many places there is at the evening meeting regular Bible reading and systematic comment, or a prepared paper. Sometimes the subject and speaker are boldly advertised. All this is grievous to some, and truly it is a sign of much. The line between the Quaker mode of worship and that of some other bodies is becoming fainter; but, though there is a vigorous cry from all sides for the "vitalising" of the meeting, it is by no means agreed that this is the proper means.

* "Memoirs of Joseph Sturge," by Henry Richard, p. 549.

† See Manchester Conference Report, 1895. Headley Brothers. This Conference was an entirely new departure for Friends, and is a most significant event. Never before in the history of the Society had there been a succession of meetings for the reading of papers and discussion upon questions of interest to the Society. The Conference has been succeeded by "Summer Schools" for the study of the Bible and other subjects connected with Adult School work, but a second Conference has not yet been held.

* From the Adults Schools proper there have sprung up various religious societies, going under different names in different places, which for many of the scholars are their only Church. Most of the new recruits to the Society of Friends come through these societies, but for brevity I speak of them as coming from the Schools. The societies themselves are bringing the Society of Friends face to face with interesting and important problems which I shall speak of presently.

Lastly, there is a conflict in matters of doctrine. I doubt whether there was ever so deep a doctrinal cleavage in the Society as now. The same might, no doubt, be said of all religious bodies. But the fact is not always fully revealed and confessed, as it was at the reading of papers at the Manchester Conference on "The Attitude of the Society of Friends towards Modern Thought." The position is, indeed, a critical one, and Quaker tenderness is taxed to the uttermost. But the times are altered since the Hicksite Secession in America. That secession itself, and still more the influence of Whittier's large-souled verse, tell in favour of tolerance for the innovators, who are indeed strong in themselves, being the best educated men in the Society. There is, too, the overflowing testimony to be gathered from the early Friends, that the Holy Spirit is itself the Supreme Innovator, and that Quakers who refuse to change do not understand Quakerism.

HENRY RAWLINGS.

THE CHURCH OF THE SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY.*

II.

"When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth."—John xvi. 13.

AND now I go on to ask, as we gather here in loyalty to our special faith, What to us is this lineage of the spiritual life? What have we in common with this fellowship of souls in many ages and churches who have lived in the Spirit? Many lines of influence and inheritance, no doubt, meet in the Unitarian movement; and many types of preaching and living present themselves among us to-day. From one point of view we may be regarded as sheer dissenters, protestants against the prevailing creed, anti-Trinitarians. It was a work which had to be done—this defence of simplicity and reasonableness in religion, this attack upon statements of doctrine which degraded the nature of man and insulted the nature of God. Yet it was an incidental rather than, as many imagine, a final task; and it confronts us not only with a duty, but with a peculiar temptation. The creed of negation constantly solicits us to a fellowship of denial and a policy of obstruction. It is a creed easy to preach and still easier to practise. It encourages the poor conceit of conscious superiority and the barren homiletics of superficial controversy. If such a creed, as many of our critics and some of our adherents seem to believe, were the foundation of our faith; if our communion were but a Cave of Adullam, where, as the book of Samuel says, "every one that was discontented gathered themselves"—we might have our little day of usefulness like other forms of negation, and should then be lost in the inevitable reaffirmations of the Church. In comparison with such a communion a house built upon the sand would be a monument of stability and permanence.

From another point of view the Unitarians may appear to be the representatives of the once dreaded movement of English rationalism and German criticism. The English movement in philosophy, beginning with Locke and ending with Mill, the scientific habit of mind in Priestley, and the constant controversy with an established church, all gave to the earlier Unitarianism of Great Britian an apologetics of externalism. "The Scriptures," wrote the sainted Lant Carpenter, "are our only guide." The rationalism of the Unitarians had no other foundation than that which supported the orthodoxy they opposed. It was an issue of interpretation, concerning whose principles both parties were agreed. This English rationalism was soon re-enforced by the more learned criticism of Germany; and the problem of interpretation began to concern not texts of Scripture only, but the very character of the Bible itself. It was a learned, unshrinking, scientific process, in whose flame supernaturalism, in its traditional form, was to be consumed, and theology was to be tried as by fire. To this enterprise of candid inquiry the Unitarians committed themselves. The first literary venture of Theodore Parker was a translation of De Wette's "Introduction to the Old Testament." Two generations of our ministers were taught the demonstrations of rational criticism. Mysticism was to their teachers a title of contempt. "Schleiermacher," said Andrews Norton, "well called the veil-maker." It is a strain in our blood of which we may be justly proud. The rationalism of that generation opened the way for the more fruitful methods of the higher criticism which is revolutionising Biblical criticism to-day, and the spirit of rationalism still gives to those who accept it a sense of composure among the Biblical controversies which threaten to rend the life of many a Christian church.

Yet how incomplete is the story of the Unitarian spirit, if it were told either in the language of theological dissent or of philosophical rationalism! How far we still stand from the spirit of Channing or of Martineau! How obvious it is that another line of inheritance must be considered in the interpretation of our history! Looking back upon his early training, the leader of our generation makes his confession. "Steeped in empirical and necessarian modes of thought," writes Martineau, "I served out successive terms of willing captivity to Locke and Hartley, to Collins, Edwards, and Priestley, to Bentham and James Mill"; and he recalls himself as "a logical prig, in whom I am humbled to recognise myself." Was there ever, indeed, a school of philosophy less capable of permanent control over the greatest of modern idealists; and was it not a distinct epoch in modern philosophy when in Germany Martineau received what he calls "the gift of fresh conceptions, the unsealing of hidden openings of self-consciousness, with unmeasured corridors and sacred halls behind"? What have we here come upon but a new line of inheritance, the signs of which are easy to recognise in our ideals and habit of mind to-day? Behind all the differences in definitions of the Godhead, which may set us apart from the main body of the Church, and beneath all principles of Biblical interpretation, lie these fresh conceptions of self-consciousness, this confidence in the unveiling of hidden springs, this sense of the life of God in the soul of man.

Some thirty years ago I was walking as a student with the saintly Professor Tholuck, in the famous garden where he discoursed with two generations of Americans, and he inquired in what communion of Christians I had been reared; and, on my replying that my father was a Unitarian minister, the great man remarked, "Ah! the Unitarians, they are mystics!" It seemed to me then a strange definition; and many a critic of Unitarianism, and some perhaps of its defenders, would think the German scholar ill-informed. Yet, in fact, his judgment was profoundly and demonstrably true. The Unitarians are mystics. They have contended for theological simplicity, they have contributed to Biblical interpretation; but the representative expressions of their habit of mind are to be sought, not in these fields of learning, but in their witness of the present life of God in the present life of man. It is a line of descent which has been, for the most part, overlooked, even by eulogists of Unitarianism. It is, indeed, not the trait of our stock which is most open to observation; and there are many lives among us with hardly a trace of such a pedigree. Yet through the blood of many generations runs this inherited strain of free and rational piety, which it is well for us, as we gather here, to trace. Three great names sufficiently illustrate the Unitarians of Great Britain and the United States during the seventy-five years which we are met to recall; and, while each of these men had his part in theological and philosophical progress, each of them is primarily and fundamentally a prophet of the spiritual life. In Channing, as was said of him by that kindred spirit, John Hamilton Thom, "the prominent thought, the master light of all his seeing, is the spiritual relation of himself and every man to God." "It is the mighty monotone of his mind, like the monotone of the ocean which souls that are not attuned to it may sometimes feel oppressive." This is our inheritance from Channing, a monotone of the spirit, a sense of the divine in man which rises out of the waves of human experience, as great rollers with their steady movement heave up out of a tossing sea. In Parker, it must be admitted, this witness of the Spirit is less uniform and continuous. There seemed to reside in him two natures, one aggressive and combative—the nature of the reformer—the other contemplative and poetic—the nature of the mystic. One of his natures was stirred by Garrison and the sense of wrong; the other side was stirred by Schleiermacher and the sense of God. There was the Parker of the platform and the Parker of the prayers; and, while the history of reform may record the activity of the agitator, the history of religion will give a still more permanent place to the spiritual intuitionalist. Finally, in Martineau, the sufficient exponent of our own generation, all the lines of our spiritual inheritance meet. His contributions to theology began sixty years ago in the Liverpool controversy, and reached their monumental expression in his "Study of Religion." The interpretation of Scripture was his concern in early youth, and the search for "The Seat of Authority" the last inquiry of his extreme old age. Great, however, as were his contributions to theological dissent and Biblical learning, neither of these interests exhausted or even represented the main direction of his mind. Martineau is at heart a mystic. His spirit dwells with the Spirit of the truth, unembarrassed by transitions in theology or exegesis. There is, he says, "a close affinity, perhaps ultimate identity, between religion and poetry." "Preaching is essentially a lyric expression of the soul." He was, as he wrote not long ago in one of his noblest utterances, "not flung into a scene which he has not learned to consecrate." To make "his affirmation of God," he had taken his stand, "not on the shifting alluvial slope of history, but on the rooted rock which belongs to the very structure of the world."

Such is the witness of the great names of our history; and when, in our own time, one would detect among the varied expressions of denominational life the heart of a contemporary religious movement, to what evidence should he turn? He should look, I think, not so much to its machinery of organisation or abstract statements of belief, but to the religious sentiment itself as it expresses itself in lyrics of praise and prayer. Some ways of faith hardly admit of being sung at all, and have made no important contribution to the history of Christian verse. Other forms of faith have borne as their flower a special quality of sacred lyrics, with a fragrance of their own. The heart of Methodism is disclosed in the hymns of the Wesleys; the nature of evangelical piety is laid bare in the hymns of Watts and Doddridge; the inner faith of the Moravians is told in their glowing hymns; and in the hymns of Keble and Newman is the characteristic note of the Anglican Church. "If a man," said Fletcher of Saltoun, "were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation." With equal justice we might say that, if a man were permitted to make the hymns of a church he need not care who should make its theology. Tried, then, by this interior test, what is the spirit of the Unitarian tradition? No one can fail to see that its religious life has uttered itself in a lyric expression of singular freshness and beauty, touching in many moods and keys one dominating note. It is a hymnology of the Spirit, the song of those who rest within the Everlasting Arms. It is not an accident that out of a religious movement which is often held to be sheer rationalism or dissent there has grown the most clearly defined type of religious verse which this country has produced. It is not an accident that the lyrics of Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Bryant, and Emerson proceed from lives bred in the rational piety of the Unitarians, or that Whittier, who must be joined with them in the fellowship of the "Inner Light." And, when we pass from the great masters, what does it mean that from a group of minor poets of the same tradition—from Samuel Longfellow and Furness and Hedge, and many others among the elders, from Hosmer, Gannett, and Chadwick, and many others of the present generation—there has proceeded a strain of lyric theism whose music penetrates many a church where the doors are closed against the poets? It means that beneath the vigorous rationalism and sincere dissent of the Unitarians there is a deeper movement of religious life, a consciousness of God which none but a poet can utter, a spiritual lineage which unites these modern minds to the great company of witnesses of the Real Presence—the fellowship of the Church of the Spirit.

It would be contrary to the very thought I have in mind if this claim to an inheritance of spiritual religion should be interpreted as the arrogant assumption of an exclusive right. The truth which makes men free is always the same truth. The sympathies of the Church of the Spirit are not denominational or provincial or contemporary. The devout Unitarian finds a familiar speech in Thomas à Kempis and in Fénélon. The spirit of Jacob Böhme is no stranger to the spirit of Emerson. The "Discourses concerning Religion" of Schleiermacher, in all probability, suggested the "Discourse concerning Religion" of Theodore Parker. The idealism of Fichte would have been greeted by Channing as the voice of a friend. It is, indeed, not easy to fix the historic place of these witnesses of the Spirit. When one of them sings—

> Go not, my soul, in search of him,
> But to thyself repair;
> Wait thou amid the silence dim,
> And thou shalt find him there—is this some Neo-Platonist of the early Church, or is it Frederic Hosmer and his "Thought of God"? And when, again, we repeat—

> O love divine, of all that is
> The sweetest and the best,
> Fain would I come and rest to-night
> Upon thy tender breast—is this a verse of Madam Guyon, or is it the rationalism of Chadwick? Very humbly, then, and with a sense of imperfect obedience and a conscious insignificance among the great movements of Christian history, and yet with a sense of legitimacy, we take our place, not alone with those who contend for theological truth, but with the great company of the devout life, the Church of the Spirit. The Unitarians are mystics. Within their limited province and power it becomes their high vocation to testify to the simplicity and reality of rational religion. They may have their place in defining the sources of authority, they may do their part in establishing the rule of righteousness; but their interior spirit is that of an unobscured and uninterrupted relation of the soul of man with the life of God. Standing at the end of his own brief ministry, the Master of the spiritual life, with self-effacing composure, promises to his friends the guidance of the Spirit of the truth, which was to lead them to greater revelations than even he could possibly disclose. It must be the same with any communion which sincerely desires to follow him. Much they may contend for of liberty in the Church and of righteousness in the world, and for either of these ends they may be content to remain a protesting and free minority. Yet a greater privilege and a more imperative summons comes to them to transmit the witness of the Spirit of the truth, which shall guide men into richer revelations than it is possible for any single sect to teach or even to dream.

UPPER CHAPEL, SHEFFIELD.*

A BI-CENTENNIAL VOLUME.

Mr. Manning's history of Upper Chapel is a very full record, and a most welcome contribution to the bi-centenary celebrations. We may not agree with his interpretation of the history at every point, but the book is a valuable and most interesting piece of work, which will be especially prized by those who have any personal connection with the chapel. There are biographical notes, not only of the successive ministers, but of laymen also, who have been prominently connected with Upper Chapel and have been notable in the history of Sheffield—such men as Thomas Asline Ward, Edward and Herbert Bramley, the Becketts, Thomas Jessop, the Fishers, and Michael Hunter. Of several of these, as well as of seven of the ministers, ranging from Timothy Jollie, in whose time the chapel was built, to Mr. Manning himself, the present minister, there are good portraits among the illustrations, which include also the exterior of the chapel, Hollis's Hospital, the Jessop Hospital, and the interior of Channing Hall.

The history of Upper Chapel is of special interest as showing in a notable instance how insecurely any line of separation can be drawn between "Independent" and "Presbyterian" in the early days of English Nonconformity. In an introductory chapter Mr. Manning gives an account of the Acts of Uniformity and other Acts of repression directed against Dissenters. He points out that after the Act of 1662 a majority of the two thousand ejected were moderate Episcopalians and Presbyterians; but a large minority were Independents, among whom were James Fisher, vicar of Sheffield, who became the first minister of the congregation afterwards of Upper Chapel, Robert Durant, his successor, and Timothy Jollie, in whose time, as above noted, the chapel was built. Thus the congregation of Upper Chapel is to be reckoned as "Independent," and when in 1700 the chapel was built, it was, as was at that time the rule among Nonconformists, whether "Presbyterian" or "Independent," with an open trust, for "the worship and service of Almighty God." As a matter of fact, we are assured that more of the old chapels of that period with open trusts are now in the hands of the Congregational body than in our connection. There was in those days, when the prevalent doctrine was strictly Calvinistic, no thought, according to Mr. Manning, of leaving the door open for future theological changes. And he adds, "The open trust was part of their dissent," which appears to mean that it had no particular meaning. At the same time it did leave the door open, and made it possible for many of the old congregations to pass on to a clearer conception of spiritual freedom and the principle of non-subscription.

For the very interesting account of James Fisher, the ejected vicar of Sheffield, his sufferings in the days of persecution, and the early fortunes of the congregation to which he ministered, we must refer our readers to Mr. Manning's pages; but from the account of Timothy Jollie's ordination we must quote a little.

Jollie was the third minister. He came as a young man of twenty-three to Sheffield, having been educated for the ministry by Richard Frankland at Rathmel. In 1681 he was ordained by Oliver Heywood, in a house where they were staying in Sheffield, and in the Presbyterian manner of ordination. Other ministers were called to take part with Heywood in the solemn act, and he, as he records in his diary, was chosen moderator.

I wd have avoided it but was compelled to it, the people came together about 10 a clock, I began the work with prayer my god did graciously assist in that duty about an hour, then we put young Mr. Jolly on the work of preaching for a tryal of his gifts, he preached on Isai. 59, 1.2, very satisfactorily, we dismissed the people, and then fell to our work of examining him, wherein we spent about three hours, going through logick, philosophy, languages, divinity, ... having dispatched this work we parted near 6 a clock, appointed to meet at the same place (viz. at Abel Yates) at 7 in the morning, and some kept that time.

Two members of the congregation, Heywood says, did not approve of this "examination by presbyters," but next day the ordination was completed without interruption, as thus described:—

Then I proceeded to propound such quaerys as are prescribed, | to wch he answered, and then his father was willing to give him up to god in Baptism, which he did very pathetically, and after that he kneeling down upon his knees we standing about him, god helped me to pray over him in his actuall ordination by imposition of hands, and there were considerable affections in all the people.

The actual call to the ministerial charge of the congregation was afterwards given by one of their own number, and accepted by Mr. Jollie, and after other exercises the day's proceedings concluded, having lasted for twelve hours, with half an hour's interval between four and five. "There was," Heywood adds, "more than ordinary mercys in this solemnity and all the transaction."

It thus seems that while Jollie was ordained by Presbyterians, his appointment as minister was strictly congregational. But when Upper Chapel was built, the power of appointment was vested not in the congregation, but in the Trustees, and this, as Mr. R. E. Leader has already pointed out in the Sheffield Independent, is neither Congregational nor Presbyterian.

So it happened that on Jollie's death in 1714, when there arose a question of appointing one of two assistants to the vacant pastorate, one a high Calvinist, the other a man of moderate views, the Trustees, with the concurrence of the majority of the congregation, appointed John Wadsworth, the moderate; and the strong minority seceded, and formed a new Independent Church meeting in Nether Chapel. From that point the process of doctrinal change continued, mild orthodoxy passing into Arianism, of which the last representative among the Upper Chapel ministers was Nathaniel Phillips (1805-1837), succeeded by a decided Unitarian, B. T. Stannus (1838-49), under whose ministry, after the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act in 1844, the chapel was rebuilt, and reopened with great éclat in 1848.

In speaking of this process of doctrinal development Mr. Manning says that the congregation "definitely adopted Unitarianism as its fundamental principle," and quotes in proof of this a minute of 1837 recording a discussion by the congregation of measures "to produce a reaction in favour of Unitarian sentiments in Sheffield," when it was decided to hold services "conducive to the propagation of Unitarianism." But surely a congregation may do that, while still maintaining the principle of Non-subscription, and the freedom of its open trust for the acceptance of any fresh revelations of truth. Mr. Manning says, quite rightly, that the religious teaching at the Upper Chapel for the greater part of this century has been what is best described as "Unitarian Christianity"; but when he adds that the congregation having for its fundamental principle the Unity and Spirituality of God, "is faithful to the mission of the Unitarian Church from the beginning, which was to teach a rational and spiritual faith," we cannot help asking, What is "the Unitarian Church"? The Christian Church we know, but when did this "Unitarian Church" begin to be, and what is its relation to the Christian Church? And, further, to a hasty reader the above sentence might appear to assume, that only Unitarians are devoted to the mission of teaching a rational and spiritual faith; but that cannot be what Mr. Manning means.

There is much more in the history of Upper Chapel over which we should have been glad to linger, and especially the account of Jollie's early sufferings and his work at Attercliffe Hall, where he succeeded Frankland in the work of educating young men for the ministry, and had among his pupils Secker, afterwards Archbishop, and Bradbury, the sturdy Independent; but we must leave Mr. Manning's work, with a strong recommendation to all who are interested in the history of our churches, to procure it for themselves, and in conclusion, will simply append a list of the recent ministers of the chapel, whose friends will have a special interest in the celebrations of next week.

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

Sir,—I see that at a meeting of my old friends of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association my young friend Mr. Fripp made some references to me personally, on which I trust you will allow me to say a word. I wrote a letter to The Inquirer, in which I followed Mr. Hargrove in pleading for an honest acknowledgment of the Unitarian basis of our worship. I did so on the ground that the public outside—the "strangers," as they are sometimes clumsily called—ought to know that the worship to which we invite them is based on a Unitarian and not a Trinitarian view of Christian doctrine. Mr. Fripp thereupon describes Mr. Hargrove and me as saying "Away with Free Christianity and Liberal religion and Undenominationalism, and other vague, weak things. Let us follow our brethren in the United States and have a definitely Unitarian flag and a definitely Unitarian Church organisation, and make it our chief work, as ministers, to Unitarianise the world." There is not a hint of all this in anything Mr. Hargrove has written. It exists only in Mr. Fripp's imagination. Having thus made a bogus Mr. Hargrove, he proceeds to invent a bogus Mr. Clayden, "once a co-worker with Dr. Martineau for inclusiveness and catholicity, who now declares that he repents, that America has taught him a more excellent way, and that he is a Free Christian no more." I have made no such declaration. I said that I had learned from experience that to call Unitarian worship Free Christian was popularly regarded as not honest, and that an American visit made some years later, in 1880, had confirmed me in the wisdom of the course taken long before, at Kentish Town, of calling our Unitarian services by their proper Unitarian name. The Mr. Clayden who "declares that he repents" is a product of Mr. Fripp's distemper. I know no such penitent. Mr. Fripp, indeed, loses sight of his own creation; for having pictured a Mr. Clayden who declares that he repents, he goes on, after an eloquent denunciation of America, to say that "there is no note of penitence in Mr. Hargrove and Mr. Clayden." How one can "repent" with "no note of penitence" Mr. Fripp may know, I cannot guess. Nor do I see what we have to be penitent for, unless it is for not sitting at our young friend's feet. He says we "come with laudation and defiance." Laudation of what? defiance of whom? He accuses us of having "joined the men at Essex Hall who have been trying for years to make us all utter the Unitarian Shibboleth," and other things too silly to quote. I suppose "the men at Essex Hall" are the Unitarian Association, and the phrase is a discourteous allusion to the gentlemen who year by year accept the Presidency of the Association, or act as its Vice-Presidents, or belong to and attend the meetings of its Council, or give time and strength to the work of its Committees. I am proud to be associated with such men. I probably joined them before Mr. Fripp was born, and have acted with them ever since.

He describes them as bent on making our Free Churches Unitarian Churches, and compelling those who cannot accept Unitarianism to leave their communion. The only fit reply to such talk is in the Shakespearean lines :—

> This is the very coinage of your brain
> This bodiless creation, ecstasy
> Is very cunning in.

Sir,—I ask your permission to suggest a new appellation which might put an end to the hitherto endless controversy concerning the name "Unitarian."

With so much unanimity as to the unfitness of the word "Unitarian" for either of the purposes which it is made to serve, it seems strange that nobody can find another name. The purposes it is meant to serve are only two: 1. As designation of a form of belief it was never exact, because all Christendom, Jewry and Islam, believe in the Unity of God as opposed to Polytheism; while, if involving a definition of Godhead, in the present state of theistic doctrine, Unity is not a whit more satisfactory than Trinity. 2. As denomination of Christians meeting together for worship. Now, were it a nickname—like "Ranter," "Quaker," "Come-out-er," "Nullifidian," or "Muggletonian"—given to us by contrary-minded outsiders, I, for one, would put up with it on the sweet principle of "suffering fools gladly." But it is not so. It is a nickname—for inexactness and unfitness—but it is taken by ourselves, and to that assumption, in all humility, I object with all my might. In the learned and interesting address delivered at the Memorial Hall on Oct. 3, by Principal Gordon—facile princeps among "us" for learning in Nonconformist history—there appear some facts about the taking of this name which will astonish any who attend to them. "By a strange irony of fate," says our Principal, "we have derived the Unitarian name from the exiled Poles who never, even in exile, adopted it as their own." Let us take the name by which this Polish Church was established—"forced into separation"—namely, as the Minor Church, in 1565. Let us be content, in the presence of the Church as by law established, to call ourselves the "Minor Church of England." But for the uncomfortable suggestion, we might fitly, long ago, have called ourselves "Jesuists," a proposal—if I err not—of the late Professor F. W. Newman. If "Minor" should suggest a softer and humbler key in the blowing of our own trumpet, I cannot help thinking it would be a gain. If the same word should remind us that followers of St. Francis of Assisi are called "Minorites," there, at least, would be a suggestion that we should welcome. William H. Herford.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Lesson of Patience.

A boy once stood under the shade of a tree on the borders of a great forest. The leaves of the forest trees had changed their usual tints of green into the brightest gold and crimson, for the time of year was autumn. The boy was grave and thoughtful, as boys so often are, who long to know more of the secrets which lie hidden in the hearts of trees and flowers. Many things around him he could not understand, but that made him strive the more to find out all the wonderful ways in which God had made the earth so useful and so beautiful. On that September evening he had stood thinking for an hour or more without noticing that the red rays of the setting sun were sifting through the branches and reminding him that it was time for turning homeward. Suddenly a fluttering sound made him look up. He saw that a leaf was gently whirling its way to the ground, and soon the breeze, which had brought down one leaf, increased to a boisterous wind and there was a perfect shower of leaves which followed their leader down to the soft carpet of moss at his feet. "Ah!" thought the boy sadly, "the cruel wind will soon make the poor tree quite bare"; and as he turned to go home, it was with a sigh at the thought of so many carefully-nurtured, gaily-coloured leaves coming to the ground to die, and he could not help whispering to himself, "What wastefulness!"

In that same forest, on a lovely summer day, stood a man who loved it so much that he would have made it his home. He had lived among men and had worked hard at the toil which falls to the lot of many. Now he had time to rest in the heart of the forest, and he would have been content to remain for ever in its shade. "How old this giant oak must be," the man said to himself. "How many years have passed since its great life was hidden away in the tiny acorn? When did it begin? When will it end?" The thought of the ending of beautiful things brought a touch of sadness to his mind. "Ah!" he said, "the fate of this tree will be that of all the forest, to go down, down to the earth and be lost for ever, and Death will be the conqueror." The very thought made him look regretfully over the living green of the crowded lines of trees. And he also said, in hasty bitterness, "What wastefulness!"

A child, brought from the crowded city in spring-time, stood in the farmer's field. He was one of those poor little ones who knew nothing more of the great green world out in the country than pictures can show and words can explain. But now the good farmer-uncle had brought him out of the city to see and hear for himself, and his little heart was filled with wonder. "Take this bag of seed," the farmer said, "and you shall learn to sow it in those long furrows of earth." With the bag slung upon his shoulder, the child went eagerly to the work. Handful after handful of the dry-looking grain fell into the soft earth. Little did the city child guess what good would come of his work, and as he trudged along, strange thoughts filled his mind. He had thrown things upon the ground himself, when they had been useless to him; but he did not understand why the little brown grains of corn should be cast away, for he had a vague idea that in some way or other his daily bread was made from them. So he, like the man in the forest and the boy who watched the falling leaves, had the same thought: "What wastefulness!"

The Angel of Hope in after years came down to the forest. There she sought the boy who had watched the falling leaves with such regret. He was older and wiser now, and she bent and whispered in his ear the wonderful secret of the falling leaf. She told him of how, when the leaves are lying trampled on the ground, a force begins to work in them which causes them to decay. "I will tell you," she said, "what is the meaning of decay. It is the setting free of the hidden juices of the dying leaves which go to make the earth so rich that other plants may grow upon it. Even the lives of fallen leaves have not been wasted. They rise again in the form of food for other plants; they have but given up their lives that the life of others may be sustained. So if you listen you may hear God's voice saying to Nature, as the wonderful Teacher of Galilee once said to his disciples, 'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.'" The message of Hope struck on the boy's ear as the sweetest he had ever heard, and he left the forest with his heart as full of joy and brightness as new-born Hope could make it.

Next the good angel came to the man of toil. Him she called to come with her to tracts of earth where forests had stood long ages ago, but now were sunken far, far below the surface of the ground. Down through deep places they went, which would have been too dark for them to traverse if it had not been for the brightness shed by the Spirit of Hope. Yet there were living men in those black depths, and all at work, lightened only by the lamps they carried in their hands. "Here," said the Angel, "is the storehouse of buried trees. See how the kind earth has packed them into layers on purpose for the use of man. Ages she spent in changing, by gentle influences, the sinking forest into the black shining substance you call coal. Men call this place a pit, but angels have named it 'the Storehouse of Warmth and Brightness.' Live now in hope, and no longer in despair, for the buried things have risen again to a new life, and are giving themselves day by day to the use of man."

Once when the sun was shining hot on the fields of corn the Angel of Hope flew to the city child, and with kind hand led him out to see them. She showed him what had arisen from the burying-places of the grain he had cast into the earth. Glorious green blades of waving corn were standing all around him, and in his little heart he felt the same wonder that the prophet in the old legend must have felt when he saw the dead bones brought back to life and clothed with flesh. "They are risen," the Angel said, in a sweet, assuring tone. "It was no waste to trust the precious seed to the good earth's care," and she spoke the words of the man of wisdom who said, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit." The child's heart was filled with joy. He went back to the city lightened by the bright rays of hope, and never was heard again to speak of waste and uselessness in Nature's ways.

DIVERSITY OF OPERATIONS IN THE ONE SPIRIT.

ALL the reports that have reached us of the centenary celebrations at the Dukinfield Old Chapel Sunday School bear witness to the strong hold that school has had upon the affections of successive generations of children and of teachers, the large place it holds in the social and religious life of the community in the midst of which it has been so long established, and the beneficent work it has accomplished for the building up of character and the nurture of sincere, practical religion. From distant lands messages come back to such a school at any marked season of commemoration and rejoicing, telling of men who have gone out to make new homes for themselves, but who can never forget the gratitude they owe to the school in which they were trained, where they received their first impressions of religion, and made their first friendships. Then it is seen how the good seed sown in quiet faithfulness springs up in many places, and the strong integrity, the loyal Christian discipleship, the standard of good citizenship, the salt of true affection, which for generations have been part and parcel of the old school, are helping to make the strength, the good order, the Christian manhood of new countries. And the very streets of the town, where the familiar building has stood so long, bear a like witness ; for as the scholars and their teachers walked in festival procession through Dukinfield, as is the custom in North country schools, and on this great occasion old scholars, now grey bearded men, fell into the ranks, tears were seen in the eyes of some who stood to see them pass, eloquent testimony to the depth and tenderness of affections wakened long ago, memories of childhood long since past, of vanished faces, but undying love and gratitude.

The crowded meetings at Dukinfield, both in the school and at the Sunday services, the spirit of enthusiasm and loyal affection in speakers and hearers alike, told the same tale. A happier re-union it would be difficult to imagine, or more richly fraught with good hope for the continuing prosperity and beneficent influence of the school. Several generations were represented in those gatherings, linking, in memory at least, the whole century together. A grandson of the Rev. JAMES HAWKES, the founder of the school, was there, and the families of ROBERT BROOK ASPLAND and JOHN GORDON, later ministers, were also represented. After them came the Revs. J. PAGE HOPPS, PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, G. HAMILTON VANCE, and HUGON S. TAYLER, the present minister, all of whom were present, and took part in the commemoration. And as with the ministers, so with the teachers, many of whom had been scholars also. It was a great home gathering, in which the rejoicing must extend far beyond the actual circle of those who were present, and a signal testimony to the rich fruits of patient continuance in well-doing.

Very different was the scene, when on Tuesday last the members of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties gathered for their annual meeting in the old chapel at Horsham—very different, and yet no less delightful in its way, and a like witness to fidelity and wholesome religious activity, which bear good fruit in small things as in great. The little country town was bathed in glorious sunshine as the members of the Assembly, gathered from many sides, streamed in from the station. The quiet streets and quaint old houses seemed to give a friendly welcome, especially to those who had come out from the noise and stress of the great city and more than all the old-world chapel, standing in its peaceful graveyard, with memorials of many generations, and at the same time tokens of living reverence and active faithfulness. In the schoolroom at the back was a library of several thousand volumes, which does in the town a silent work of education and enlightenment, which cannot be too highly prized, and in the old chapel itself one could well understand how even in times when only a few gather within its walls for habitual worship the influence of a steadfast and earnest ministry must make itself felt. The meetings of the Assembly would, we trust, give something back to the hospitable friends at Horsham, in new energy and courage and hopefulness, bearing witness to a cordial sympathy and union in a common work. The meetings, which are reported in our present issue, showed, if we mistake not, a growth in the spirit of unity, and a strenuous pressing forward towards more effective service. That ideal is set before us all, in the great centres of life and in the quiet country places. One is thankful to know how much good has gone forth and continues to go forth from the humbler homes of piety and steadfast loyalty to truth.

Quite different again was the scene at the re-opening last Saturday of Little Portland-street Chapel in the centre of London, and yet rightly to be included within the same circle of faith and hope. There was a house of prayer, doubtless in unlovely surroundings, but rich in potent and uplifting memories ; girt about by a sea of life fraught on one side with worldliness and pride, on the other with pain and sordid cares, deeply dyed with insidious streams of vice, in the midst of the splendour and the shame of a great city. And there was a band of faithful worshippers anxious to preserve their house of prayer as a centre of rest and refuge and purer life. They have renovated the chapel, made the place of meeting pleasanter, and let in fresh light. Close at hand they have great school buildings, which can be used as the home of social and educational activity. In the past the voices of TAGART, TAYLER, MARTINEAU, and WICKSTEED have spoken in that place the words of faith, the message of Eternal Love. From them the remaining worshippers have received a trust which they earnestly desire to sustain and fulfil in the house of prayer rich in such memories, and in the neighbourhood the needs of which are now greater than ever. They may well appeal, not only for sympathy, but for active help from those who hear the cry of the desolate and perishing in the city wilderness, and will give something of the vigour and brightness, the wholesome interest and enjoyment of their own lives for their brothers' need.

These are instances of the great variety of the work to which we are called in the community of our Free Churches, and the manifold opportunities for beneficent service open to those who have not yet found a way of losing their old selfish life, that they may save their true self alive. Amid all the variety there is the one Spirit, and therein lies hope for the future—the hope that our post of duty in the service of the Kingdom shall not be unoccupied, but may find us united in growing strength, clearer insight, more perfect self-forgetfulness, that faithfulness may achieve for us by the grace of GOD the joy a larger ministry in the things which belong to a true humanity and the world's peace.

THESE pains and troubles here are like the type which the printers set. As they look now we have to read them backwards, and they seem to have no sense nor meaning in them; but up yonder, when the Lord God prints us off in the life to come, we shall find that they make brave reading.—Martin Luther.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

The annual meeting of the Assembly was held at Horsham on Tuesday, and the perfect summer day added greatly to the enjoyment of a delightful and successful meeting. At the morning service, the old chapel was completely filled, save for some back seats in the gallery. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. M. Daplyn, of Hampstead, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church.

THE SERMON—"THE BUILDING OF JERUSALEM."

Taking for his text Nehemiah ii. 17, 18; iv. 6, ending with the words, "So built we the wall: for the people had a mind to work," Mr. Freeston asked what was the work to which as representatives of a group of Free Churches they were called? It was not that of the iconoclast, the controversialist, or the sectarian. Theirs was a higher work, the work of the Spirit. It was their mission not to break down but to build up, not to separate but to unite, not to strive about belief but to transform it into life, not to rattle the artillery of controversial theology but to heal the wounded in the fray, not to screen themselves in with the partitions of opinion but to take their part in the raising of the spiritual Jerusalem.

They had been urged just recently, and on the mere ground of expediency, to set up those partitions round all their churches, to paint them over conspicuously with party theology, and then to admire their superior honesty! Those who should be their leaders, whether in London or Leeds, had recanted publicly their previous consistency, because, forsooth, they had been to the United States, and because the man in the street sometimes made mistakes! And they were threatened with "deserved obscurity" unless they, too, bowed low to that idol of expediency. But they had not so learned their Channing or their Martineau. Their visitors to the United States amazingly confused the issues. If personal doctrine were the issue in question, they would all be ready to stand to the term that most plainly denoted their theology; but if the very charter of their Free Churchism were the issue, the permanent principle of non-subscription to doctrine, the sacred ark of the covenant handed down to their keeping, it was those others who had stepped down from a great historic position, who sold their free birthright to the man in the street, they who repeated the very mistake they had so strongly condemned in others, when they asked them to doctrinalise all their churches in order to clutch at some outward advantage. But in that Assembly they had made their choice. They took principle—and obscurity if such it was to be, rather than pay the price of apostacy.

But there was something more to be done than combat that misconception. The Presbyterian principle of non-subscription was indeed the foundation-stone of their organisation and of every constituent congregation; but it was only a foundation. The Unitarian protest had cleared away the theological débris and prepared the way by its free inquiry; but it was only a theology. In neither was there now the driving power of a mission, neither alone made a holy Jerusalem, a living Church for living men. Two stages in their history awaited a third. When the ground was prepared and the foundation laid, they were ready to build, with the sword of the spirit at their side and the trowel of truth in their hand. There was a building to be reared for God in each of their hearts and churches, in their Assembly, in their country. Man was never more a co-worker with God than when his religion was upraised from a logical argument or a theological content, to a constant and constructive effort of his whole spirit and thought and act.

There were three chief things they had to build up, and the first was faith. Faith was more than opinion or authorised belief. It required conscience to quicken it into conviction, prayer to deepen it into devotion, trust to bring hope in its train, and love as its crown and consummation.

There were those in whom faith was of little more worth than an intellectual revolt from irrational statement, an entire reliance on the reason, but an unconscious absence of spiritual apprehension. It was critical and logical, it was candid and very straightforward, it was conscientious and made no pretence—but it had a narrow range, it lived in the plain, it was unaspiring, had little poetic exaltation or prophetic vision; it was true and good as far as it could go, but did not lift its eyes to the hills or press singing onwards; it seemed hardly conscious either of the wide expanse amid which it moved or of the fair lands in the distance. It had little passion or deep heart yearning for those things divine which eye had not seen nor ear heard, nor the rationalistic mind conceived. That somewhat diffident faith was accompanied by a pride of truth, a contented theology, and an easy responsibility, sufficient to support an uninspiring life, but not at all able either to make a gospel or to stir the people. And so it did not overcome the world or remove mountains or soar into the heavenly places, or enter into the exultant hopes, and trusts, and joys which were faith's own precious privilege. What it lacked was the uplift of the spirit, the spring of emotion, the free swing of self-forgetful feeling, the happy sense of God within. But when the rational man put on his spiritual imagination, when the mind was caught up and outstripped by the heart, and love gave wings to thought, when, warm with life, faith issued forth from its home in the innermost being, and it was the soul which spoke because it could not be silent, then they felt that faith was present, they did not prove it by argument, they knew it by instinct. That was what they so much needed, that poetry, that joy, that mountain step of faith.

Their faith must hallow their truth, and it must transfigure their theology, and it must make for unity—not uniformity, but unity amid diversity, the inner union of hearts which must come to pass before men could witness the Universal Church. And their faith must turn their freedom into obligation. All the priceless freedom they inherited, in thought, in religion, in college and church, was but means towards an end. Freedom without obligation was a dangerous possession. If they were to build the walls of Jerusalem they must obey the principles of spiritual upbuilding. In the last analysis all faith was obedience.

As the second need for their building he named a true patriotism. Not a military or commercial patriotism, which put interests before principles, markets before moral ideals, chartered companies before human lives, but a purer, nobler patriotism in which they would renew the virtues of their forefathers, to work for education and temperance and justice, for citizenship, for the commonwealth, for the land they loved the most.

And, finally, they needed to build up the Church idea. There was so much loose Church allegiance amongst them, half adherence, casual attendance. They were in actual possession of the Church's one foundation, which alone was universal in its inclusion; but that Church oneness had not yet taken hold of them, it did not kindle their emotion or imagination, or set going that glowing contagious enthusiasm, which should come from their realised place and purpose in the fellowship and furtherance of the one Universal Church. They as individualists in doctrine and independents in organisation needed a definite conception of the Church as the most efficient servant of the religious life. And what was true of the church was true no less of that Assembly. They had not risen to the height of their opportunity, they were not yet even independent of the help of other organisations. There were many things they might do to make the Assembly a more effective organ of their church life, and with which they might inaugurate the new century. They should take higher ground in the future, stand higher and stand together, ministers and laymen, to build the wall of their Jerusalem, to make each one of their churches also a temple not made with hands, where from week to week they might gladly meet in the love of truth and the spirit of Christ, for the worship of God, and the service of man.

The collection at the close of the sermon amounted to £15 7s. 6d.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

Lunch and tea were served with abundant hospitality in the Albion Hall, where at each meal it looked as if not many less than 200 persons were present.

In the afternoon the business meeting was held in the chapel, the President, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., in the chair.

The Roll of the Assembly was called by the Rev. Frederic Allen, the secretary, and the following new names were added: the Revs. F. W. Stanley, H. S. Perris, W. Wilson, E. Turland, T. Shakespeare, S. S. Brettell, G. Lansdown, H. M. Livens, and D. Amos; and as lay-preachers, Messrs. Ellis Mann, W. H. Shrubsole, and O. A. Shrubsole.

The congregation at Halstead (Essex) was also admitted to the Assembly.

The President having presented the reports and the treasurer's statement, in the absence of Mr. Walter Baily, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the minister-at-large, speaking in supplement to his report, referred to the large amount of energy which had been absorbed by the London Bazaar, and to good purpose, as the Fund so raised would put the London churches in a much better position for progressive work than they had ever been before. The great difficulty in breaking new ground was to find suitable halls for meeting. He also appealed for more lay-preachers to help in the work of the Province, which was under his superintendence. The Romans, it was said, were sometimes beaten in a battle, but never in a war; and so they might meet with reverses, but they were fighting for truth and righteousness, and they must be successful in the end.

The report spoke of the representative character of the Committee, and the opportunity afforded of strengthening the scattered churches of the Province, and appealed for more general interest on the part of the stronger churches. It referred to the success of the London Bazaar, and the new effort at Sydenham, the lectures of the Rev. S. G. Preston, of Hastings, at the Clive Vale Board School, and the renovation of Deptford Chapel. The report of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards gave an account of his various activities in the oversight of the weaker churches of the Province. The balance-sheet showed that the year opened with a balance of £66 5s. 4d. in hand, to which were added subscriptions of £129 2s. 6d., collections and donations £160 14s. 5d., grants from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association £160, grant from the London District Unitarian Society £20, a total of £536 2s. 3d. Expenses, including the stipend of the minister-at-large, and grants to nine congregations amounting to £122 10s., reached the sum of £450 12s. 4d., leaving a balance of £85 2s. 3d. in hand.

On the motion of the President, the reports were ordered to be printed and circulated.

The officers were then re-elected, and the President was appointed representative of the Assembly on the Committee of the National Conference.

The Sunday School Union representatives were also appointed, Mr. J. Ellis Mace to be their representative on the Committee of the Sunday School Association.

A communication from the Rev. James Harwood as to the Advisory Committee was followed by the re-appointment of that committee.

On the invitation of the Rev. F. K. Freeston, on behalf of his congregation, it was agreed that next year's meeting should be held at Essex Church.

The Rev. E. M. Daplyn was appointed preacher for 1901, and the Rev. G. D. Hicks supporter.

The President then offered a welcome to representatives of kindred societies, to which response was made as follows.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, replying on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said that since the formation of the Assembly the Association had been one of its warmest and most generous supporters. In the present year he observed they had made grants to the Assembly amounting to £160. What they wanted was not to trouble about names, but to put heart and soul into the work they were doing, to minister to the world's needs. The one great thought of his committee was how best to do the most good.

The Rev. A. J. Marchant, responding for the General Baptist Assembly, said that their Associations were almost identical in aim, both striving for a pure and progressive religion.

Mr. Hahnemann Epps responded for the London District Unitarian Society, and said that the formation of the new society had been a distinct gain to their common work.

Miss Marian Peitchard responded for the Sunday School Association, and in reference to suggested publications said that books for the culture of the imagination were needed by others beside their children. That would lead to more kindness in judging of one another, and they would be spared such grievous errors of courtesy, as they had witnessed in the past week. She also referred to the proposed monster meeting of Sunday-school workers in London next Whitsuntide, and hoped every school in the Province would be represented.

Miss Tagart responded for the Central Postal Mission. Many inquirers, she said, did not accept their ideas, but they were glad of information, and they very seldom met with any rebuff. Theirs was not a controversial society. They did not wish to force their convictions on others, but in a sympathetic way to help inquirers to clearer ideas. Their sympathy was extended to isolated thinkers in all parts of the world. Not only the pamphlets sent out, but the friendly letters that went with them made theirs a true mission. They had lately received letters from the President of a Buddhist college in Ceylon, from negroes on the Gold Coast, from India and the Colonies, and other distant countries, and also from many kinds of people at home.

The President then delivered his address. That Assembly, he said, was not an old one. They had only begun in 1889, though they managed to call that the twelfth annual meeting. But their principles were by no means new, as was testified by the building in which they were met, and others in the Province. Among those principles they were all agreed in holding that of freedom in religion to come first, and nothing would cause such an outcry among them as the proposal to impose any form of creed. There were fifty-two churches on the roll, some of them of considerable age. A fourth of them dated from the period before 1700, another thirteen came between 1700 and 1850, and the remaining half were established in the last fifty years. Thus it was clear they were not committed to a dying cause. Of the thirteen earlier than 1700 five belonged to London, eight to the outside district. Of the thirteen between 1700 and 1850 five more belonged to London, and eight to the outside. Of the other twenty-six, nine were outside and seventeen in London, so that the proportion was reversed, and they had latterly to some small extent been meeting the responsibility involved in the enormous growth of the metropolis. Yet, after all, what was that number of churches amid the millions of people. The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire included eighty-two churches amid a population of about four millions. Their own fifty-two churches were in a province with seven millions of people. He had reckoned that in Greater London there were eighteen districts, each of them with as many people as a large town elsewhere, in which there was no church of theirs within reach. In the north they were preparing to make a great effort in preparation for the new century, to revive the life of their congregations, to do more work for religion and to deepen the feeling of the sacredness of life. Could they not in their Province also be doing something? He had spoken of their principles of freedom in religion, but they must also stand for religion in freedom. Religion was what they wanted. People must be converted, and made to feel the eternal verities of life. Without the spirit of consecration, no scheme would be of any avail. He asked that during the remaining months of the year their labours should be specially directed to helping the young people in their churches. During the century they had received great blessings in privileges won by their forefathers' sturdy fighting. In that same spirit, honouring the good and great of the past, they must lay a good foundation at the beginning of the next century and do their part in the same service.

After tea a meeting of the Postal Mission was held in the chapel, Miss Tagart in the chair, when the report presented by Lady Wilson was accepted, and it was agreed to ask the Committee of the Assembly to appoint a Postal Mission Committee to work with Lady Wilson, and to consult quarterly with other representatives from the Province.

EVENING MEETING.

At half-past six a public meeting was held in the Albion Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., who, after the singing of an opening hymn, referred to the fact that twenty-five years ago he had taken the chair at a meeting of the Liberation Society at Horsham, and for fifty years had been in the habit of attending their anniversary services on Whit Sunday. He thought it was not sufficiently recognised that they held a unique position in being able to offer help to those who were repelled from orthodox bodies and deprived of the solace and strength of religion. They could show that there was food for religion in all the living interests of the world. If they were true to themselves and their views of life they ought to have great power with the people.

Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., asked why it was they spoke of that as the nineteenth century, from what it was that their centuries were marked off? And going back to the birth of the child Jesus he traced the gradual growth of Christianity, its conquest of the Empire, and consequent corruption, and then the revolt of the Reformation and the new life that came through the brave and faithful spirit of their Puritan forefathers. They vindicated the right of every man to read the Bible for himself, to study Nature for himself, to listen to his own conscience and so find God's holy truth, and then fearlessly to proclaim it and to teach it to their children and to the world. What must they do with that great heritage of liberty? There was still the Catholic Church making its old claims, as witnessed by its recent treatment of Dr. Mivart. The Church of England, while they must thankfully acknowledge the enormous amount of good work done by the clergy, was yet thrusting the priest between parents and their children. Orthodox Dissenters also were doing immense good. With them they had formerly stood shoulder to shoulder in many a fight, but latterly it had been the cold shoulder that had been offered, though he was confident that better times would come. As to themselves, he was glad to see what faithful testimony was borne by that old chapel for truth and freedom, and it was their duty especially to impress upon the young the history of their churches, the meaning of their dissent and of the truths they held. In spite of much wrong remaining in the world, if they took long enough views they would see that there had been progress. They must be confident, as they entered on the new century that God was working in the human race, and leading them onward.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie spoke of the great encouragement they must receive from such an earnest and enthusiastic gathering. There were difficulties felt by all churches in the present time. Uncertainty of thought on the great questions of religion was wide-spread, and in spite of outward signs of success in the popular churches there was an inward unrest which tended to paralyse the whole religious life of England. The great mass of the people of whatever rank were not interested in religion as now presented, they were in no living connection with any religious movement. He did not say that the people as a whole were in a worse condition than formerly. In the bulk of the working classes, if they got at them and made a direct appeal, they found the foundations on which religion could be built; but no church had yet succeeded in doing that. Whether they themselves were capable of doing a great deal, he did not know, but they were capable of doing something to meet the need, if only they were faithful to what they had. He had no sympathy with any kind of narrow denominationalism. He had worked for twenty years with men of every Church and no Church for the public good. But there was a denominationalism that had help and strength in it, which meant comradeship, co-operation and the sympathy of men and women inspired by the same ideals and animated by the same motives. Any movement lacking such co-operation was doomed to failure. For himself he owed a debt of gratitude to their Unitarian forefathers that he could never forget, for they had set him free from the trammels of Calvinism and opened out to him a religion full of joy and truth, love and hope. They were to be remembered with honour not only on account of their piety, their theology and religion, but for their services to humanity, their broad spirit of public usefulness, their work for political freedom and against slavery in any form. That was the spirit in which they must now work, not living in a little world of their own thought, but trying to minister to humanity, and remembering that humanity was many sided and had many needs. There was no one medicine, theological, social or political, that would cure all ills; some still needed intellectual cures, others the touch of human sympathy, the sweeter, quieter pieties; but their Unitarianism, as he conceived it, contained all those things; it was open to the truth from whatever source it came. God's truth and love were eternal, and that was what they wished to proclaim; those were the moving wheels of the world's progress; to those high things they desired to consecrate themselves and their Churches.

The Rev. E. M. Daplyn pleaded against the danger of introspecting, the state of permanent analysis, which was confusing and paralysing. Sydney Smith had called Scotland the knuckle end of England, and they were perhaps the knuckle end of Christianity. There was not much fat about it—but the nearer the bone the sweeter the meat, and it was a pity if they kept any of it from the world, for the world needed what they had to give. The work of their churches was not to draw men and women out of churches where they were really at home, but to help the many who were homeless, and had lost faith. They must speak the truth in love, realising their faith, affirming the things they knew and felt of God, His life, His power, His love for them and constant movements toward them, to draw them into the true life. And they must teach others what they really knew about Christ, about his life and death, and about that power which was the vital centre of the Church's life—the soul. They must make men feel what was meant by being a living soul.

The Rev. S. Gardner Preston said that while he never hesitated to call himself a Unitarian, he thought they were too apt to call things "Unitarian doctrines," which were common to many others besides themselves; thus freedom of thought, the conception of the Bible as man's thought about God rather than God's thought about man, and a reasonable view of the Atonement, should not be spoken of as Unitarian doctrines, they were now common to men of various churches. "Back to Jesus" was the true aim; they should preach to the world not Unitarianism, but Christianity at the fountain-head. Their influence would be far greater, he thought, if they lectured not on "Unitarian Christianity," but on "The Christianity of Christ"; they should declare to the world not what Unitarians taught about God and Christ, &c., but what Christ himself taught. They would put their position right with the world by showing that their endeavour was to understand the mind of the Master, and to bring people to learn of Jesus himself.

On the motion of the Rev. J. J. Marten, seconded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman and the speakers of the evening, and the meeting terminated. Earlier in the day warm thanks had been given to the Horsham congregation for the admirable arrangements made, and their hospitable welcome to the Assembly.

HYMN FOR THE CENTENARY OF DUKINFIELD SUNDAY SCHOOL.

God's blessing on the gracious souls,
  Who served Him here below,
And sowed for us the bread of life,
  A hundred years ago!
O'er untried field they ventured forth,
  And flung their precious seed,
In faith that shining after-days
  God's little ones would feed.

The Master's word, "Go, feed my lambs,"
  Few heeded in their day.
They heard the message, clear and plain;
  And heard but to obey.
But now ten thousand willing hearts
  Are listening to the call;
Ten thousand voices plead his cause:
  God's blessing on them all!

Bright memories linger in the past;
  Bright hopes before us rise,
That lead us from the toiler's path
  Up to the restful skies.
Join voices now, of old and young;
  Let love with song outflow,
To bless the hands that wrought for us
  A hundred years ago!

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

On Sunday, Oct. 7, the annual sermons of the Association were preached by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., of Bolton, in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Good congregations were present, and collections were taken on behalf of the funds of the Association. The annual business meeting was held on the following day in the church. Representatives were present from Stockton, Middlesbrough, Sunderland, South Shields, Carlisle, Gateshead, Byker, Choppington, and Newcastle. There were also present the Revs. C. J. Street, E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, W. H. Lambelle, Charles Travers, Francis Wood, and Arthur Harvie.

The chair was occupied by the retiring President, Mrs. John Tweedy, and the proceedings opened with hymn and prayer, after which Mr. Fred C. Slater, corresponding secretary, read the annual report of the Committee, which referred to the successful opening of Unity Church at Gateshead and the continuance of the work at Byker and in other congregations of the district. The settlement of the Rev. F. Wood at Sunderland and the removal of the Rev. H. B. Smith from Darlington were noted.

In the regrettable absence, through illness, of the treasurer, Mr. John Pattinson, J.P., the statement of accounts was presented by Mr. J. Duncan Donald, showing an income of £408 0s. 10d. and an expenditure of £465 7s. 5d.

Mrs. Tweedy, in moving the adoption of both reports, said she felt grateful to all the workers who had done so very much for the advancement of the cause, more especially to the ministers and lay-preachers, who were untiring in their efforts to promote the simple gospel of the Unitarian faith. She believed that as a people they had three great wants—the want of earnestness, the want of unity in their work, and the want of funds. This last she believed arose out of the other two. She urged all present to put greater zeal into the work which would be undertaken in the coming year. They had not the opposition to contend with of former days, and that fact ought to be a source of encouragement to all.

The resolution was seconded by Councillor Robert Elliott, of Gateshead, and carried.

Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., of Newcastle, was unanimously elected President for the ensuing year.

The Rev. Charles Travers moved that a cordial vote of thanks be given to the officers and committee for their services during the past year, and further moved the re-election of the officers, together with a committee. This concluded the business portion of the meeting, which then resolved itself into a conference.

The Rev. Arthur Harvie read a paper entitled "The Future of the Association," in the course of which he advocated several drastic alterations in its constitution. An animated discussion ensued, in which the following took part:—Mr. W. J. Watson, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, Revs. C. J. Street, E. C. Jones, C. Travers, Mrs. Tweedy, Mr. F. C. Slater, and Mr. J. Duncan Donald, after which the following resolution, moved by the Rev. C.

Travers, and seconded by Mr. W. J. Watson, was agreed to:—

That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that some change should be made in the organisation of the Association, the basis of which being an association of churches, and that the Committee be requested to lay a scheme before the next Spring Conference, the details to be submitted to all subscribers at least one month before the date of such conference.

After tea in the adjoining schoolrooms, provided by the ladies of the Dorcas Benevolent Society, a public meeting was held in the church, which was well attended, the new President, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, in the chair. After thanking the members for the honour they had conferred upon him, the President appealed to the members and ministers alike, for hearty co-operation and united efforts in carrying out the work of the Association.

Mrs. John Tweedy moved that the best thanks be and are hereby given to the Rev. C. J. Street for his valuable services in the pulpit on the preceding day; this was seconded by Mr. Robert Wilson, of Newcastle, in an eloquent address, and supported by Mr. Otto Levin, secretary of the Church of the Divine Unity.

Mr. Street, in rising to respond, met with a very hearty reception, and, in the course of an interesting speech, trenchantly criticised the attitude taken by the Rev. E. I. Fripp in his paper, "Idolatry of Doctrine," as summarised in the last issue of The Inquirer.

The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., who also received a cordial welcome as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said how pleased he was to meet his Newcastle friends again, and to hear of the success of the movement in Gateshead. He referred to the settlement of Mr. Wood at Sunderland, and spoke encouragingly of the condition of the churches on Teesside, some of which he frequently visited.

Brief addresses were also given by the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, Charles Travers, Francis Wood and Arthur Harvie.

After the usual vote of thanks the meeting, which had been of an enthusiastic character, closed with hymn and benediction.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

Such a glimpse as an ordinary mortal like myself can get into the past records of Unitarianism in this Manchester District is proof enough that an intensely interesting history could be written by one qualified for the task. Minute-books have been lost here and there, and even trust deeds; but there is still much material available to the man who has a love for research and a patient industry.

In the earliest list of our churches on which I can lay my hands—namely, the Rev. George Harris' list, dated 1819—I find that twelve Manchester District Churches were in existence. They are also all in Hadfield's list dated 1824-25, which leaves out Strangeways and Swinton—congregations established in 1823 and 1822 respectively. In 1846 Dr. Beard published a list which included the churches in both the previous lists, except Mosley-street and Salford. Mosley-street had been abandoned, and Upper Brook-street built in its stead. The Salford cause died out, owing, perhaps, to the establishment of a more vigorous one at Strangeways, not a great distance off. In Dr. Beard's list, Pendlebury is a new name; it was the forerunner of Swinton. Then, too, for the first time appeared the Domestic Mission (now Willert-street), which, though unsectarian, was established and supported by Unitarians. In 1846 there were fourteen churches in this district; to-day there are twenty-four—an increase of ten in fifty-four years. Not very many, it is true; but the growth has been gradual. We have not carried everything before us; our work has been all uphill, and very hard. Still we have steadily gained ground, and we have abandoned only one cause in the half-century. In 1880 a cause was established at Droylsden—a mistake was made in the selection of site amongst other things, and in 1890 the District Association closed it. During the first twenty years of this century two new causes were established—Altrincham and Oldham; in the twenty years ending 1840, three new causes were established and two churches rebuilt; in the twenty years ending 1860, three new causes were established and two churches rebuilt; in the twenty years ending 1880, three new causes were established and nine churches rebuilt; in the twenty years ending 1900, five new causes have been established and six churches rebuilt. By the end of this year every congregation will have its church building and its trust deed. This means that during the century thirty-five churches have been erected, or in a very few cases bought; and in addition, almost everywhere, schools have been built or rebuilt. This will give my readers some idea of the amount of activity and enthusiasm and generosity there has been.

In the year 1823, the Provincial Assembly held its annual meeting at Chowbent, and a letter was read from Mr. Yates, of Liverpool (who was absent through indisposition), recommending a more general adoption of Missionary preaching among the Unitarians of Lancashire and Cheshire, and offering £100, to be appropriated to this purpose. A Committee was appointed to carry into effect the plan suggested. It was to meet at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and was to consist of "all Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers in Lancashire and Cheshire, and each was to desire his church to appoint two persons to attend." They also had power to add to their number. The first meeting was held in Cross-street, Manchester, July 1. The Provincial Assembly in those early days was pronouncedly Unitarian in spirit. In its minutes one comes across such phrases, used in connection with itself, as "Unitarian body" and "Unitarian interests"; while in 1826 it by resolution connected itself as a District Association to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, established a fund for the purpose of sending an annual grant (in 1830 it sent £10 additional towards the establishment of a city mission in the Metropolis), and promised to "transmit to the same annually a brief statement of its proceedings." It is not for me to go outside the Manchester District and say what effect this missionary enterprise had elsewhere; but, judging from the results here, it must have been a distinctly Unitarian propaganda. All the sixteen churches established this century are avowedly Unitarian. One calls itself Free Christian, and another by the name of a road; but they all, without exception, for practical purposes, unhesitatingly range themselves under the Unitarian flag. I have found that statistics of expenditure during the first half of the century are hard to get with correctness. Besides, if it were otherwise, they might be misleading, for the value of money is so vastly different to what it once was. However, I have pretty accurate statements as to cost of buildings from about 1864. I find that in the decade ending 1874, £46,757 was spent upon new churches and schools; in the decade ending 1884, £25,877; in the decade ending 1894, £43,940; and in the last six years, £30,400; a grand total of £146,974 in thirty-six years!

There are also available very interesting statistics regarding ministers' stipends. I have the stipends given at eleven of our Manchester District churches in 1844. There were two of £30 and two of £50 per annum; but three fair stipends brought the average up to £148. In 1869 four out of eighteen stipends were below £100—the lowest being £50—while the average was as high as £204. At the end of the century, out of twenty-three stipends, only two are below £150; while thirteen are at £200 or over. The average stipend is now £216, and in addition there are five parsonages. As far as the real life of the churches is concerned, we should like to see things a little more flourishing than they are. We do not fill our buildings to overflowing; but taking into consideration the selfish policy of our city congregations in days past, we may congratulate ourselves upon our position being so strong as it is. In a subsequent letter I will show how this has been the case; though I am strongly of opinion that we are going to enter upon a new century with brighter prospects all round than we have ever had before. We are now splendidly equipped with buildings; and the custodians of certain of our ancient fanes are beginning to question whether their endowments are wisely spent in keeping open doors for a mere handful of people (most of whom might easily attach themselves to suburban churches), where such grand opportunites offer themselves in new centres of population; and nothing is required for their development save an unselfish and judicious apportionment of resources which are now tied up, and, as many think, questionably so. Though our Sunday congregations are not what we think they ought to be, there is no reason why we should be downhearted. The total membership is very much higher than ever it was; and certainly never at any previous period has there been anything like the same amount of practical Christian and educational work done.

During the last twenty years we have erected fifteen new and commodious schools—most of them replaced inadequate and insanitary buildings; the rest are new foundations. And it would be difficult to estimate the good work which is being carried on in them. Take Lower Mosley-street School, for instance. It is one of the most successful centres of week-evening classes in Manchester. Under its roof is conducted a Social Club which is exerting a wholesome influence upon the lives of several hundreds of young men and women engaged in the business of this great city. Or take Dob-lane; it is a centre of teeming life. It has a day-school which holds a high standing, and its accommodation is taxed to the utmost; while its evening classes are recognised as amongst the best in the district. Its buidings are so much engaged that it would probably be utterly impossible for the folk there to undertake fresh work, however much they wished to; and it is gratifying to record that the Church membership is three times as large to-day as it was fifty years ago.

I fear to mention places by name, lest I be thought invidious in my selection; and yet let me say how utterly impossible it is in a short article like this to attempt to describe the grand use to which the splendid school at Monton and the smaller but handsome school at Upper Brook-street are put. Monton and Platt also have successful day-schools. Of the work done at the missions we cannot speak too highly. They were never more active or more flourishing than they are now. They have to turn scholars away, and at one the Sunday congregation practically fills the chapel. Certainly there are two or three of our churches which are very seriously affected by the great change that has taken place in the character of their surroundings, and they naturally wonder what they will have to do in the near future; but for the most part our suburban churches are anything but despondent. More of them are self-supporting than ever before, and they are looking ahead hopefully, and working patiently, for the time when those members of the Orthodox Churches who are now holding practically Unitarian opinions will see that their only really consistent course is to throw in their lot with us, and give us the benefit of their presence, their energy, and their financial help. Nobody expects that Unitarianism will sweep the land as Wesleyanism did. It advances slowly, yet surely.

There is no comparison between our position at the beginning of the century and our position now. The few buildings existing at the beginning were extremely small for the most part—Blackley and Sale, for instance; the latter accommodating seventy people, and the former very few, if any, more—now we have handsome and commodious buildings everywhere, all resting on a democratic basis of government, although we are not without one or two anomalous trust deeds. The District Association, which is now doing such admirable work, had its origin in the fifties, when its income amounted to less than £70 per annum; last year its income was £577 9s. 4d.; and if that were doubled it could be most profitably spent about Forward Movement work which is urgently waiting to be tackled. On a previous occasion I described the special scheme of winter work devised by the Association for the purpose of stirring the religious life of its constituent churches, and for giving publicity to the religious faith for which we stand. This is being proceeded with, and in November nearly forty special services and lectures are already arranged for. If you will allow me, I shall be able to report progress after Christmas, and to speak of our prospects and hopes for the new century.

Hull.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. E. W. Lummis preached in Park-street Church, on "Chaucer's England," this being the inaugural lecture of a series on the subject of Geoffrey Chaucer, which are to mark the Sunday evenings of the present month.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

Great pressure on our space prevents more than the following brief chronicle of a number of Harvest Thanksgiving Services held last Sunday:—

Blackpool: South Shore.—Preachers, the Revs. H. B. Smith and William Binns.

Belfast: Domestic Mission Church (Sept. 30). Preacher, the Rev. G. J. Slipper; offertory in aid of piano for the Sunday-school, over £2.

Bootle.—Preacher, the Rev. J. Morley Mills.

Devonport.—Preacher, the Rev. E. R. Hughes.

King's Lynn.—Preacher, the Rev. A. J. Marchant; followed on Wednesday by a tea-meeting and entertainment.

Kingswood, near Birmingham.—Preacher, the Rev. J. H. Matthews. Collections for the Kingswood Benevolent Fund, £4 10s.

London: Kentish Town.—Preacher, the Rev. A. Farquharson; and at the afternoon children's service Mr. Fellows Pearson, a former superintendent of the school.

London: Wandsworth.—Preacher, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Fifteenth anniversary of the church.

Reading.—Preacher, Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, F.G.S.

Whitchurch.—Preacher, the Rev. W. F. Turland, followed on Monday by a pleasant social evening.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The third annual sermons of the Sunday-school were preached in the Richmond-street School Chapel last Sunday by the Rev. Charles Peach. The afternoon service was not largely attended, but in the evening the new room was crowded with a congregation which numbered over 300 persons. The collections realised £14. Since the opening of the building in May the congregation has made satisfactory progress. The average attendance for the summer months has been 100, the collection £1 10s. Now that the winter work has begun, considerable growth is hoped for. Morning services commence next Sunday. A sale of work will be held on Oct. 30 and Dec. 1, the object being to free the building from its debt of £300.

Bridport.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay. On the following evening a tea-meeting was held in the schoolroom, when reports of the various societies connected with the school were read, and cordial thanks were given to Mr. O'Connor for his services.

Brighton.—On Saturday, Oct. 6, took place the first of a series of afternoon rambles, inaugurated by the Rev. H. M. Livens, minister of the church. The party met on the Downs, and had a pleasant stroll across the hills to the picturesque little village of Ovingdean. On the way several hummingbird hawk moths were seen; these are far from common, and are rendered specially interesting by their movements—now hovering apparently motionless over a flower, now darting off to a distance with extreme rapidity. After visiting the ancient Norman Church, tea was partaken of in one of the cottages; the old kitchen of the Grange was then inspected, which has been made immortal by Harrison Ainsworth, and after a very enjoyable walk the party returned by moonlight along the cliffs to Brighton.

Boston.—The congregation of Spain-lane Chapel have lost one of their oldest members in Mr. J. M. Keine, who died very suddenly on Thursday week, and was buried on Sunday afternoon. Mr. Jenkins, H.M.C., conducted the service, and in the evening made sympathetic allusion to the loss sustained by the congregation. The "Dead March" in Saul was played at the close of the service.

Cullompton.—Mr. Henry J. Galpin, who passed away on Sept. 27, after a long and painful illness, in his thirty-fifth year, is sadly missed in the congregation and the Sunday-school, of which he was superintendent. The funeral took place on Sunday, Sept. 30, and was attended by a large number of Foresters and Juvenile Foresters. Of the latter Mr. Galpin was President, and had filled the offices of Chief Ranger several times, and auditor and delegate to the district meetings. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick, district minister, conducted the funeral service, and in the evening preached in the chapel a memorial sermon.

Dukinfield.—The meetings to celebrate the centenary of the Sunday-school were continued on Saturday last, when a grand re-union of former scholars and teachers was held. Over 700 responded to the invitation of the Centenary Committee. On arrival at the school they were each presented with the medal struck for the occasion, and, entering the reception-room, were welcomed by some of the senior workers. This room contained portraits of former ministers and school workers, and many relics connected with the history of the school and chapel. After signing the roll the visitors were passed on to the tea-room, and then a short organ recital was given in the chapel while the room was prepared for the meeting. This was presided over by Alderman J. Kerfoot, J.P., chapel warden and an ex-director of the school, supported by the Rev. H. S. Tayler, the present minister; Revs. J. Page Hopps, P. H. Wicksteed, and G. H. Vance, former ministers of the old chapel; the Revs. A. Gordon, W. C. Hall, and L. Scott; Rev. H. Titterington (Moravian minister) and the Rev. J. Magee (Congregationalist); Messrs. J. Jackson, Joshua Cartwright, C.E., M. Welde, A. A. Cheetham, E. B. Broadrick, and J. Bancroft, ex-directors; Mr. J. D. Kerfoot, Councillor W. E. Wood, and other gentlemen. Letters of apology and good wishes were received from the Rev. G. R. Calthorp, M.A., vicar of St. John's Church, Dukinfield; the Rev. M. Wilson, curate of St. Luke's Church; the Rev. D. R. James, Congregationalist; and Father Patrick Murphy, St. Mary's, Dukinfield. The meeting was a magnificent one, the large room being crowded in every part, and an opening hymn, written for the occasion by Mr. Hopps, was heartily sung. After a few words of welcome and retrospect from the chairman, addresses were given by the Revs. G. H. Vance, P. H. Wicksteed, J. Page Hopps, A. Gordon, H. S. Tayler; Messrs. J. Jackson (the oldest surviving ex-director), J. Cartwright, and T. H. Gordon. The chapel choir rendered selections of music at intervals. At the conclusion of the meeting all joined in singing "Auld Lang Syne," and after the evening hymn Mr. Wicksteed pronounced the Benediction. Special services were held on Sunday, the pulpit being occupied successively by the Revs. J. Page Hopps, P. H. Wicksteed, and G. H. Vance. Large congregations attended at each service, and listened to eloquent sermons from voices which carried them back in imagination to the days of thirty and forty years ago. All the meetings in connection with the centenary have been highly successful, and will live long in the memories of those who attended them.

Frenchay, near Bristol.—On Sunday, Sept. 30, Mr. Edgar Lockett concluded his two years' student ministry, and preached an appropriate sermon of farewell, the occasion being also a Harvest Thanksgiving Service. On the following Wednesday evening, after tea at the hospitable house of Mrs. Croome, a farewell meeting was held, and an oak writing cabinet was presented to Mr. Lockett, with expressions of gratitude and good wishes for his future career. Mr. Lockett is entering as a student at University College, Bristol, with the purpose of subsequently entering Manchester College, as a student for the ministry.

London: Forest Gate.—On Sunday evening the Rev. Frank K. Freeston preached an anniversary sermon to a full congregation, his topic being "The Strangers' Church." A good deal of life is apparent at Upton-lane, despite the widely-scattered nature of the society, and the winter months promise to be interesting. The Literary and Social Union has a full syllabus; a minister's class is to be held, and a course of Sunday evening studies, entitled "Echoes of the Dying Century," has been projected. Mr. Perris has undertaken to conduct a reading circle for teachers, at the request of the West Ham Educational Conference, and its President, H.M. Inspector.

London: Hackney.—A party was held in the schoolroom of the new Gravel-pit Church on Friday evening, Sept. 28, when the teachers, some past and present scholars, and many friends of the Sunday-school, met to say farewell to Miss Edith A. Gibbs, who for many years has been a teacher, and has now resigned, as she is leaving the neighbourhood. At the close of the evening the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor presented Miss Gibbs with a handsome watch bracelet, and an illuminated album, containing 108 names of subscribers to the testimonial, on whose behalf he asked Miss Gibbs to accept this token of their esteem and appreciation of her long and devoted services to the school.

London Little Portland-street.—On Saturday, Oct. 6, the chapel was reopened with a special service, after thorough renovation, as already described in these columns. The aspect of the interior is now light and pleasant; the pulpit has been lowered, the pews in the body of the chapel have given place to much more comfortable open benches, and under the galleries are open passages, which can be fitted with seats in case of need. A congregation of from 160 to 200 could now be well accommodated on the floor of the chapel, while the galleries with the old pews still remain. The opening service was conducted by the Revs. W.

Copeland Bowie and T. E. M. Edwards, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. Taking for text Hebrews xi. 4, "He being dead yet speaketh," Mr. Dowson dwelt upon the sacred associations connected with the chapel from the time of the ministry of the Rev. John James Tayler and Dr. Martineau, when he himself was a student at Manchester New College. From Mr. Tayler he had heard at Norwich the call which brought him into the ministry, and at the centenary of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich he had first heard Dr. Martineau preach. Mr. Dowson then devoted his sermon to a reverent and grateful record of what he and others owed to those two great teachers. At the conclusion of the service, which was well attended, the congregation and their friends adjourned to the Portland Schools for tea. On Sunday the special services were continued, conducted by the Rev. H. S. Perris, the present minister, the preachers being in the morning the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, in the evening the Rev. F. H. Jones. Mr. Wicksteed, in his sermon, spoke of the great need of such agencies as that congregation could render effective to fight against the practical materialism of the age. Formerly the battle had been against theoretical materialism, and it had been splendidly won, but the stress was now in resisting the over-powering materialism of society, a practical atheism destructive of all that was noblest and best in life. His aspiration was that that congregation might be enabled to take a good part in the battle.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

The hideous cruelty of dissecting living animals, or inflicting on them, though innocent and defenceless, multitudinous deaths of excruciating and protracted agony, has secretly grown up in this Nation—a Nation which for ages past has been nobly distinguished by the courageous and unsanguinary character of its people.

This moral ulcer has spread widely, and (whether it be or not a dreadful form of insanity) become dangerous and demoralising to Society—a blot on Civilisation—a stigma on Christianity. The public has little idea what the horrors of Vivisection are; its crimes in studied, ingenious, refined, and appalling torture, in wantonness, uselessness, and wickedness cannot be surpassed in the annals of the World. It therefore calls for extirpation by the Legislature, cruelty being not only the worst of vices in itself, but the most retributive to mankind, more especially when perpetrated by the refined and educated.

The above Society appeals to the Public for aid.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AFTER the meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, next Tuesday afternoon, at about five o'clock, an opportunity will be afforded to sympathisers with the work of the Brahmo Somaj of India, of joining in a greeting to Mr. Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, and of hearing a farewell address from him, on the eve of his return to India. Mr. Mozoomdar, as our readers are aware, came over to attend the American Unitarian Anniversary Meetings at Boston in the spring, and during the last weeks his voice has been heard in a number of our churches. Tuesday's meeting will afford one more opportunity for the expression of that close sympathy which unites us to our brethren of the Brahmo Somaj

THE first of the Rev. J. E. Carpenter's course of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was given at Essex Hall, on Tuesday evening, and was attended by an audience of over two hundred deeply interested hearers. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, President of the Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties, who briefly introduced the lecturer, and Mr. Carpenter then opened his subject with a reference to the changed views of the Bible, and what is gained by the method of historical investigation and reasonable interpretation of the sacred books. The first lecture dealt specially with the Law, and its significance in the religious life of Israel. Next Tuesday's lecture is on "Changed Views of Prophecy." The lectures are freely open to the public by tickets which may be had at Essex Hall.

ON the evening of Sept. 17 a social meeting was held in the Free Protestant Church at Cape Town, under the presidency of the Rev. R. Balmforth, the minister. The guest of the evening was Lady O'Hagan, who, as our readers are aware, has been for some time in South Africa, engaged in the organisation of hospital nursing during the war. In the course of a sympathetic address Lady O'Hagan expressed her pleasure at meeting members of that Household of Faith in which they knew no distinctions of sect or country, but stood simply for freedom in religion and for Christianity. They in England, of the same household, were not eager about numbers, but they wanted to be of the spirit of the Faith, and to teach by example, by conduct and by faith. She spoke of Unitarians in England who were members of Parliament, and were prominent in local bodies and in commercial circles, especially in the North of England, where they were looked upon as leaders of social equity and justice. They laid great stress on the importance of the education of the young. On the London School Board and throughout educational circles in England their influence was felt. They whom she addressed formed but a small church as yet, but working in a spirit of love and charity, she believed there were unbounded possibilities for them in that great land. She wished them Godspeed, in the trust that in that Free Christian Church men would rise up who would be in positions to benefit humanity, which was the great object of their Church. They must show a readiness to work and pray with other Churches, a willingness to unite with them here as they hoped to be united hereafter in the bosom of the Father. Proposing a vote of thanks, Mr. Balmforth asked Lady O'Hagan to represent in this country the desirability of taking steps to promote the spread of liberal religion in South Africa, a mission which she willingly undertook.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that Lady O'Hagan has consented to open the Sale on Thursday next at Essex Hall at 3 o'clock. It is hoped that there will be a large gathering of friends on that occasion, not only in the interests of the London Bazaar Fund to finally dispose of the various articles left in May, but at the same time to offer a warm welcome to Lady O'Hagan on her return from South Africa. During the Sale there will be much to interest and amuse. In the afternoon Mrs. Macrae Moir has promised the scene from Miss Austen's Emma, in which she appears as Miss Bates; Mr. Herbert B. Lawford will sing a couple of humorous songs; and Miss E. J. Troupe will provide an attractive programme for the evening.

THE National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland is to meet in Conference at Brighton next week, from Tuesday to Friday, Oct. 23–26. The subjects to be discussed are of great and varied interest. On Tuesday the Presidential address is to be given by the Hon. Mrs. A. T. Lyttelton and the first discussions are on "The Present Condition of Women's Secondary Education" and "Women on Educational Authorities." In the afternoon Mrs. Humphry Ward is to read a paper on "The Training of Afflicted Children," and Miss Zimmermann on "The After-care of Afflicted Children." Women's work as Government Officials and on public Boards, Temperance Legislature and Inebriate Homes, Foreign Missions, Hospital work, the Housing Problem, the Modern Home, the Life of English women in India, and the Right Use of Leisure are all subjects which appear in the programme. The Conference is to be held in the Dome and the Pavilion, where tickets may be had during the days of meeting.

THOSE hearers of Mr. Darbishire's address at the opening of the new session at Manchester College, and readers of the summary of it in our present issue, who may have been somewhat astonished at his attitude towards Dr. Martineau's advocacy of the Free Christian Union, would, we think, be well advised to turn to the letters of the Rev. John James Tayler referring to that subject, which will be easily found by reference to the index in the second volume of his Letters, and also to Dr. Martineau's essay on "New Affinities of Faith," a plea for the principles of the Union, which is reprinted in the second volume of his collected Essays and Addresses.

THE October Bookman has several reproductions of "Literary portraits of the year," selected from those exhibited in the Academy and New Gallery, and among them Mrs. Basil Martineau's portrait of Dr. Martineau, which was in the Academy, one of the happiest of the drawings made in his old age. This reproduction, which is 5in. by 4in. in size, is of course far from perfect, and yet many of our readers may, we think, be glad to have it.

THE third and concluding part of Professor Peabody's sermon on "The Church of the Spirit," we are obliged to leave for a subsequent issue.

A WORD FOR UNITARIANISM.

AT the annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, as reported in our last issue, the Rev. C. J. Street, in the course of the evening meeting, criticised the paper read by the Rev. E. I. Fripp at the recent annual meeting of the North Midland Association at Derby. As a contribution to the full discussion of the question there raised, we now print the following summary of Mr. Street's speech.

It was not fashionable nowadays, Mr. Street said, to call oneself a Unitarian. It never had been a very popular task, for there were always plenty of open enemies of reasonable religion to face; but now, more than ever, Unitarianism was being wounded in the house of its friends. A new cult had arisen which repudiated the faith of its fathers, calling Unitarianism an exploded system, a decayed faith, and, strangest of all, a sectarian institution. The advocates of this new cult were all for freedom, and it would seem that truth was quite a secondary consideration. For his part, though he yielded to none in his passionate love of freedom and had fought in its sacred cause as hard as any, it was only valuable in his eyes as an opportunity for truth. He observed that his somewhat eccentric friend, Mr. Fripp, in a paper read before the North Midland Association, had quoted this remark of a leading Unitarian, "What I care for above everything is the Truth," and Mr. Fripp's comment was that he feared this expressed the general opinion among Unitarians who were afflicted with the "disease of intellectualism." If to be content with nothing less than a rational faith was to suffer from such a disease; if to curb mere emotionalism with a strong rein, while guiding every faculty of heart and mind and soul to intelligent reverence, was to be banned as "the worship of the intellect," he (the speaker) must plead guilty. These were days when truth-seeking was somewhat at a discount; but for all that, great was the Truth and it must prevail.

It had been and still was the glory of their churches that they imposed no bondage of creeds upon their members or ministers; and he for one would refuse to be the minister of any but a truly free church. Their history had taught them to love freedom and hand down their trust unimpaired to the future. Only in such conditions could a Mr. Fripp be possible. He had learnt his lesson in a good school, but now he was only too ready to condemn his teachers and hold up to scorn the deepest feelings of his friends. It was within the borders of the free churches that the principles of Truth for which most of them stood were being impugned. Certainly, no free church would ever think of driving out an honest thinker; but he sometimes wondered whether Mr. Fripp and some of his friends would not do better to ally themselves with more congenial companions, and seek a fellowship with, say, the Established Church, in which probably they would be more at home, and find less to jar on their feelings.

One thing was clear enough, that but for this freedom of the historic churches, such as that in which he now spoke, Unitarianism would not have established itself as it had done. Was it not strangely significant that freedom led to a reasonable faith which cast off the choking superstitions of Trinitarianism and restored the simplicities of earlier Christian belief? The speaker then briefly described the growth of Unitarianism in the Rossendale Methodist churches as an instance of free inquiry into the Bible leading truth-seekers inevitably to the Unitarian faith. He then proceeded to show what noble pioneer work had been done by Unitarians during the last hundred years in the way of sustaining the older churches and establishing new ones. Where would their churches be to-day if it had not been for the zealous labours of Unitarian missionaries? Take that Association: of all its churches, only two, Newcastle and Stockton, were of ancient Puritan foundation: the remainder were the creation of this century at Unitarian hands; and this was typical of the whole country. If the churches had been content with their "Presbyterian forefathers" they would have been few and feeble indeed to-day: it was convinced Unitarianism that had saved and extended them. The men of missionary spirit were not content with their freedom, but they cherished a reasonable faith which they wished to carry to others because they deemed it a gospel for all people. He stood there as a staunch Free Churchman, none freer, but one who was proud of his Unitarianism and all its honourable associations, and eager for its dissemination as a means of leading men to God.

Mr. Street then quoted some passages from Mr. Fripp's paper, in which that gentleman condemned the name "Unitarian" as "pedantic, cold, unbending, incapable of glowing or stooping to common humanity." "They could never make it not a negation." Unitarianism "abhorred a mystery." Unitarians "said little or nothing of the real deep infinite mysteries of existence, of creation, of life, of the soul, and of God." "The operations of God's spirit, His power over sinners, His redeeming mercies on hardened souls, the forgiveness of sins, the strength of duty, the rest and peace of faith—of those things Unitarians said very little." Why, where had been Mr. Fripp's eyes and ears? Certainly not in the living world with which they were familiar. It was not true to say that these vital questions of the religious life were ignored among them; on the contrary, they constituted the daily bread upon which they subsisted. He spoke in the presence of several brother ministers and many lay preachers, and in their name he repudiated these statements as slanders—not intentional slanders, of course, but none the less cruel because they were spoken in ignorance. He was not aware that Unitarianism nowadays was much more learned than any other phase of religion; their enemies, however, were ready to admit that in point of character it produced results of which they had no reason to be ashamed. He had found Unitarians quite as warm-hearted and tender as the representatives of other faiths, quite as intense in their devotion, and there were no such workers for the common good unless perhaps they turned to the Society of Friends. Both these bodies supplied philanthropists and civic workers out of all proportion to their numbers, and if a tree was to be known by its fruits, this was no mean testimony to the faith that actuated them.

Nor was it true to say that Unitarianism as such involved any attitude of hostility to other manifestations of faith. Where they were called upon to deny it was only in order to substitute some sublime affirmation which had been overlaid. If they denied the deity of Christ it was because by this confusion of thought neither God nor Jesus was glorified and the true beauty of each was lost. If they rejected the Atonement as commonly taught, it was because it laid upon Jesus a burden which they themselves were called upon to bear, and in order to recall them to the awful personal consequences of personal sin. If they repudiated the doctrine of Eternal Punishment, it was in the name of the All-enfolding God of Love who cared for all His children and cast out utterly none that He had made. And so with every doctrine of a perverted Christianity. How could the word "Unitarian" express a negation at all? It was strictly affirmative if it meant anything. Its central thought was unity—the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. It stood for the unity of the Godhead, all the forces of the universe co-operant for good and centred in the guiding hand of the Father; for the Unity of the human race as one great brotherhood under God's fatherly care; for the unity of religion as everywhere the expression, however feeble and faulty, of man's yearning need for communion with God. It was no mere "hostility to a venerable doctrine of Christendom," but a return to a more venerable doctrine still—namely, the Christianity of Jesus himself. To be a Unitarian meant indeed a simplification of doctrine, and involved the abolition of all priestly pretensions to which the carefully cultivated "mysteries" always afforded shelter and strength. It also meant a simplification of the aims and ends of life, for to a Unitarian religion was not so much a matter of ritual and observances as of daily character and practice.

In view of such attacks now being made on Unitarianism by those who had been nurtured among them and were supposed to be their friends; in view of the undying hostility of their avowed natural opponents in the churches of the more popular faith; and above all, in view of the certainties of their splendid Unitarian faith, illuminated as it was by the struggles and sufferings of its indomitable advocates, he urged them to renewed consecration of their spirits and greater earnestness in spreading their glad tidings abroad. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." The fields were on every hand ripe unto harvest, and "a son that sleepeth in harvest causeth shame."

IN our acknowledgment last week of publications received, the "Minister's Handbook," by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, was put down as price 1s. It should have been 2s. net.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

III.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (I.)

We often speak of "the century" as if it were a naturally appointed internode of time, with a certain necessary completeness. In the history of many national institutions this is a misleading fiction, but in that of the Church of England it happens that the period 1801-1900 is, roughly speaking, a real period, capable of being considered as a unitary whole. At its beginning we find the Church resting in one well-marked stage of development; at its close another epoch of rest seems to have set in. So far apart, however, are these two static points, so strange the transformation which has been wrought between them, that the work of many centuries seems to have been crowded into one. And the change is as wonderful in kind as in degree. The wisest of prophets could not have dreamed, 100 years ago, that at the end of the century the English Church would be as she is now: zealous and militant, rich and strong, purged of her lethargic vices, tainted instead with those which beset vigour and success, proud to the extreme of arrogance, clamant and encroaching, already so numerous and wide that the Archbishop of Canterbury is, in a real sense, alterius orbis papa—rich and strong, at the same time, in faith to animate, and works to justify her grandeur.

In the year 1800 the Bishops of the English Church were those who sat in the House of Lords. The clergy were for the most part of two classes—men of good family for whom provision was made in a family living, and men who had taken orders as a profession or for the sake of a fellowship at the Universities. A very large proportion of the beneficed clergy were non-resident, and practically everybody who could secure more than one living was a pluralist. The use of a curate was not to help the incumbent, but to supply his absence. Vested rights still prevented the sub-division of excessively large country parishes. Even in populous and increasing towns the old rustic parish areas were still retained. The territorial system was indeed a sham or a skeleton. The state of the fabrics was little better. The typical village church was an emblem of picturesque desolation. So little was it used (about four hours a week) that it really did not seem worth while to rescue its green pillars and mouldering walls from mildew and decay. Two, at least, even of the cathedrals were in ruins. The chancels were frequently quite unused: even the perfunctory celebration which occurred four times a year was administered elsewhere. The nave was filled with faculty pews and rented sittings, and the poor had a few free benches at the back. In the towns such effort as was made to cope with the increasing population was generally of a commercial kind, and expressed itself in proprietary chapels. The centre of interest was the pulpit, but, as a rule, one sermon a week was considered enough. Hymns were scouted as Methodistical. As for the character of the ordinary clergy, Praed's Vicar and Parson Trulliber are extreme specimens of the prevalent types. The clergyman was quite commonly a farmer, a hunting man, a man about town, less frequently a scholar, not seldom a drunkard; parsons were indeed ordinary men of any and every type, who were distinguished from the laity chiefly by a black coat and Sunday duty. The popular name for a clergyman was preacher.

The pendant to this picture is before our eyes, and I need not pursue in detail the sharp contrast which the two present. The Pan-Anglican Synod with its two hundred and fifty bishops, the devoted clerical caste with its high standard of life and its priestly pretensions, the constant building activity associated with a revival of pure architectural taste, the disappearance of proprietary chapels, the free and open churches thronged with worshippers, ringing with music, the daily prayers, the almost daily celebrations—all these will at once rise in the reader's mind. Not less signal perhaps as tokens of a century's progress in the Church are those great societies for missionary work of all kinds, for the dissemination of literature, and especially for the education of the young on what are called Church lines, societies which have come into being since 1800.

Perhaps at no one point are the earlier and later conditions more sharply contrasted than at the point of contact between Church and State. At the beginning of the century disestablishment was expected as inevitable and even imminent, and until the time of the first Reform Bill—in other words until the beginning of the Oxford movement—it seemed to be drawing nearer. The prospect was welcome to Dissenters and to the strong and growing Liberal party; whereas what called itself the High Church party clung in an Erastian spirit to the support of the State. On the one hand, Joseph Hume, speaking in Parliament, while he admitted that "a corporation like the Church, which was set up by Parliament nearly three hundred years ago, and is older therefore than either the East or West Indian Company," ought not to be abolished without compensation for vested interests, warned those young gentlemen who were then in the fourth decade submitting to "these foolish ordinations" that they could "expect no more pity than the man who bought the borough of Gatton after the publication of Schedule A." On the other hand, the Unitarian Relief Act of 1813, the relief of Nonconformists by the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1838, and Catholic Emancipation in the next year, were strongly opposed by the High Churchmen. Recourse was had to the State for various miscellaneous purposes which are now met by voluntary effort. In 1818 a grant of a million pounds was obtained from Parliament for church building in large towns, and a supplementary half million, with a remission of duty on materials, was granted in 1824.

The Church's opposition to Catholic Emancipation was prompted not only by a love of secular privilege, but also by fear of the Roman Church. The body which now so commonly entitles itself the Anglican branch of the Church Catholic was proud to be called during the first few decades of the century the "Protestant Establishment." Although a scholar like Van Mildert, lecturing in the pulpit of Oxford University Church, might include "the priesthood" among "the essential doctrines of the Church," and allusions to Apostolical Succession were not unknown, there was no attempt during the first third of the century to found upon these doctrines any practical Church policy, and what we now understand by definite Church teaching concerning the Sacraments were never heard in any parish church. The immense changes which have been brought about in every department of Church life, external and internal, may be derived almost altogether from the Oxford movement of 1833; but before that year much, very much, had been done to vitalise, purify, and extend the Church by a party whose aims and methods were far removed from those of the Oxford leaders.

To the question what was the prevalent school or colour of theology in the English Church at the beginning of the century it is hard to find a positive reply. A state of things existed which is best described by negatives. The latitudinarianism of the eighteenth century had tended to wash out and merge all strong distinctive tints. The Anglican pulpit taught neither a sacramental nor a spiritual religion, neither Calvinism nor Arminianism. The typical sermon was a moral essay, sanctioned, perhaps, by some of the most common Christian tenets. Such teaching, if it had had real life in it, might have been a great engine of religious energy, but in keeping with the rest of the service it was, as a rule, languid and perfunctory. The force behind it was a spent force; it had in it no inevitable, no aggressive element. The best and most current argument in defence of the Church services as a whole was that they formed a part of the established order, the overthrow of which had been shown by recent events in France to be fraught with fatal danger. The majority of Churchmen, clergy and laity alike, were zealous only in the discouragement of zeal.

There was, however, one leavening force in the Church, a party which, though numerically small, was so strong in spiritual energy that some of its achievements rank among the most glorious triumphs of civilisation during the century. These men, the evangelicals, the "serious" Christians as they called themselves, the "Methodists" as they were disdainfully termed by their fellow-Churchmen, were so distinguished by the power which religion had over their lives that to exhibit religious earnestness during the early nineteenth century was to be ranked as one of them. The great William Wilberforce, for instance, was by no means at one in his theology with the leading evangelical clergy; but nowhere, save in their ranks, could he find sympathy and co-operation with his deep godliness and his schemes for promoting the welfare of mankind by national sacrifice. The rise of the Evangelical movement belongs to the previous century. Its leaders, Wesley, Whitefield, Harvey, Romaine, Fletcher, Venn, Newton, Scott, had all been Churchmen. Wesley's Methodist societies had indeed separated from the Church in 1795, but that secession had brought about a reaction of stouter churchmanship among his clerical colleagues and disciples. The essentially anti-ecclesiastical character of the evangelical teaching was not perceived even by Wesley himself, still less by his successors in the Church of England, until it was brought out by the contrast of the Oxford doctrines; and while commerce of sympathy and mutual help between Dissenters and evangelical Churchmen was, of course, easier than it is between "Catholics" and "Schismatics," yet the evangelical leaders of that period were strong Churchmen of the old type.

The first great work of the serious party had been the hymns of Toplady and the Wesleys. The use of sacred poetry of modern origin in religious services was generally considered at the beginning of the century to be incongruous with the Book of Common Prayer, however appropriate to the unchartered worship of the Dissenters. But little by little it won its way, until the publication of John Keble's "Christian Year" in 1827 associated it with the rising power in Anglican theology. This was by no means the only instance in which the Oxford movement was indebted to the Evangelical movement which it displaced. In what is called secular literature the new force had inspired the strains of William Cowper, and was still the motive power in the work of Hannah More. In philanthropy it had begotten the Sunday-school movement at Gloucester. Two of the three great Evangelical societies—the Religious Tract Society and the Church Missionary Society—had been founded upon the eve of the new century, and in 1804 the British and Foreign Bible Society was founded. Thenceforward the efforts of the Evangelicals were concentrated upon their grandest project—the liberation of the negro.

What was the secret of the immense power wielded by the evangelical party? They were not strong in numbers, nor was their theology of a specially intelligent kind. A "serious" man was one who believed that the salvation of his soul was the one thing needful, that this could be effected by an effort of faith which transferred his guilt to the head of Jesus, that thereupon with the sense of pardon came the new birth, and that it was possible thenceforth to live a perfect life. But the perfect life, in its outward aspect, apparently consisted in the capricious condemnation of certain innocent pleasures, such as the theatre, novel-reading, card-playing, while others, such as the pleasures of the table and of wine, were freely indulged in. There seems to be no necessary connection between such doctrines and the mighty works which their holders wrought. But we must remember that religious earnestness, which is often the fruit of a vigorous intellect, was their exclusive possession. They captured the best men. It was through them that the powers of goodness worked. Their influence also was so focussed as to secure the greatest possible effect upon the life of the time. For the first thirty-six years of this century Charles Simeon was working in Cambridge. His sons in the faith took up their station in the great provincial towns. The London centre of evangelical activity was Clapham parish church, where John Venn was rector until 1813; among his congregation were Wilberforce, Zachary Macaulay, Lord Teignmouth, James Stephen. The highest worldly wisdom, the keenest practical sagacity was at their service, and the cause which united them was in its own nobility a source of strength. The abolition of the slave trade in 1807 encouraged them to strive for the greater issue, and in 1833 the efforts of Thornton, Wilberforce and the whole evangelical party were crowned by the emancipation of the slaves.

From that moment we date the decline of evangelicalism in the Church. During the whole of the next generation their energies were spent not so much in labouring for mankind as in combating the "popery" of the ever-advancing Oxford movement. Individual evangelists, like Lord Shaftesbury, have been concerned in worthy philanthropic work, but the centre of gravity in the evangelical cause has shifted further and further away from the Church of England. The special sources which gave strength to the party of Simeon and Venn have ceased to flow. The elements of weakness are of a less temporary kind. Nevertheless, there may be found without much searching, among the clergy who frequent Keswick Convention, men in whom the old Methodistical leaven still works to the saving of souls. Their doctrines seem to us belated, out of harmony with the increased knowledge and more developed criticism of our time. But there is still a wide region into which these have not penetrated, a region in which the earnest faith and devoted effort of those men may and do win victories for conscience and the spirit.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

The new session opened at Manchester College, on Monday, with an Address by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, at which there was a full attendance of friends and supporters of the College. During the vacation another beautiful gift has been completed and placed in the College Chapel, which was an object of special interest at the opening meeting. It is given in memory of the late Mr. Edward Bramley, of Sheffield, by the members of his family, and in pursuance of his expressed wish to make some such gift for the further enrichment of the chapel, and consists of a beautiful copy (by Miss Nevinson) of Leonardo da Vinci's well-known picture of the "Last Supper," placed in the panel over the Communion table. The panel was obviously intended to be so filled, and this picture is a very happy completion of the original design.

The following is a summary of Mr. Darbishire's Address, which was given in the College lecture-room :—

THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD. THE CHRISTIANITY OF JESUS.

In the first part of his Address, Mr. Darbishire referred to the "Free Christian Union," formed in 1868, and dissolved in December, 1870, and quoted from Mr. Clayden's letter in The Inquirer of June 16 of the present year, telling of the origin and fate of the movement. At one of the preliminary meetings the following resolution was moved by the Rev. James Martineau, and seconded by Mr. Herbert New :—

That whereas the Christian Religion, in its essential influence, is not contingent upon right opinion on matters of history, criticism or metaphysics, and in its application to life has become encumbered with a load of superfluous conditions, it is incumbent on those who find its essence in the two great affections of Love to God and Love to Man, to unite their scattered forces, both for closer communion in work and worship, and for resisting every intrusive interference with the intellect and conscience of men.

That resolution, said Mr. Darbishire, probably marked the high water of that day's appeal, as a matter of intellectual perception and advice; but against the scheme of the Free Christian Union as propounded by Mr. Martineau he felt himself obliged to protest, and to plead for a wider association than any which should confine parallel religious attachment to such persons only as would still recognise only others who would profess, in one form or another, the "Christian opinion" of the meeting. He avowed the ideal of a larger conception, and refused conformity to such Nonconformity, and cried not for union but for congregation, for the civitas Dei itself. Many men were fortunate enough to find themselves (partly through a certain overpowering sympathy with and conviction as to what Jesus himself believed and taught, and partly, no doubt, through certain Indian studies) already passed out not from the religion of Jesus, but from what appeared to them certain so-called "Christian" bondage into a wider world, a larger confidence, a surer hope, and a deeper love. There were then, as in the present time, many men who had truly entered into the Master's simplicity and self-sacrifice, and reverently and meekly with him into his own union with his Father and theirs. From him they had learnt to carry on his lessons of piety, goodwill and love beyond, no doubt, the limitations under which he himself necessarily laboured. In his spirit as faithful followers, as more faithful disciples, as most faithful apostles of his own sending, they had learnt to live in a continuous worship as wide as humanity lost in God—in God, not made in their own image—and in a constant conviction of the supreme law of Righteousness and in boundless communion in His Infinite Past and His Everlasting Presence; and therein in the like association with all humanity. And all that, not in any fanciful excitement or exaggeration of feeling, but in continuous actual living life, absolutely real, and already glorified in the only true Reality, for them while they lived in the present, in living and loving as Jesus lived and loved. So he felt constrained to plead for the open religious alliance, and the appeal met with a certain cordiality of sympathetic approval; but Dr. Martineau replied with an impassioned refusal to omit the word "Christian" from the title.

The scheme failed by its intrinsic infirmity, by its inherent unfaithfulness to the Freedom of its avowed principles, and to the true Christianity of Jesus which, after all, lay at the heart of all parties before God, however hidden up in the various phylacteries, images, or symbolisms of priests and churches and ignorant traditions, or in the elaborate verbiages of all sorts of schools. In truth, the Union was never more than a sentimental dream, far too self-conscious, and never simple enough, unselfish enough, or large enough, or real enough, to be a "Prophecy Divine."

They had been expecting, and were waiting for a new reminder of the primæval, the perpetual commandments of the eternal Law of Righteousness; for a new proclamation of glory to God in the highest and on earth, peace and goodwill to men; for a new entreaty to believe, to trust, to love as Jesus did; for a fresh challenge to shed their blood for the saving of many, and for the blessing of crucifixion. What they heard was the voice of confident dogmatism, the appeal for closer communion in their own work and worship, and a self-satisfied new kingdom of the earth. The Free Christian Union was just one of the so-called "popular delusions of the age," and, besides that, never was as sound as many of such undertakings were. They were genuine, self-forgetting contributions of personal faith and love and devotion, which the Union did not pretend to be and never could be. It incorporated self-satisfaction. An organised Union or Church ever concentrated its members' faith and love and service on itself—and became itself, too soon, an Image, an Idol, and an Antichrist.

Union for honest, self-forgetting contribution of talents, and for the organisation and the self-sacrifice of discipline and common effort for any practical undertaking of benevolence or enlightenment, or other service, was quite another thing; and, indeed, was the very condition of civilised order, strength, and progress. The distinction was essential. The latter was their World, their Life; while so-called Union or Organisation for spiritual operations and for the sake of its own charm, and its particular form and ostentation, was sooner or later prison, and starvation, and death.

What they looked for and hoped for, and still looked and hoped for, and hoped to live and die for, was liberty of each personal soul before God, free from all dogmatic imposition, even on themselves, and Religion, as pure and immediate, as unselfish and as inspiring, as it was in Jesus; and for a concensus of brotherhood as comprehensive, as universal as the love of God; for spontaneous righteousness, perfect piety and love, without self-regarding, without restriction. The so-called Catholic Church had been misled, disguised, and betrayed by the Pagan traditions and the imperial and much lower passions of degenerate Romans, and her too earthly misconceptions had clothed her jealous rival of Canterbury also, out of Christianity pure and simple. Their credentials as Churches were alike false and their ecclesiastical efforts veritable denials of the Holy Spirit. The paper constitutions of Calvin were fading away. The Christian Union could not be thought of any more than Presbyterian government could be disinterred. The strong man, the masterful speaker, might rouse and rule and guide in his own way; but it was only his followers that would follow him; and sooner or later such endeavours, whether church or crusade, in the nature of things must fade and fail, however much of good the wiser care of God and man might bring out of them and every honest and unselfish endeavour. It was only the meek, disclaiming, self-forgetting avowal of the Master's own faith, hope and love that touched each heart with his own passion, and fired the spirit of his brotherhood to pure worship and complete devotion.

The lesson of Jesus had in fact most rarely appeared in any form of the so-called Christianity of the Churches, large or small, though always the utterly unselfish faith, hope and love which the life and speech and death of Jesus ever exhibited had continually maintained his own personal character and will, his teaching and example, in every open soul from the day of Calvary until now. In spite of all the vanities, proclamations, ambitions, and deceptions of every Church, that had been the secret of its real life and influence.

The abiding power and example of Jesus himself as a child, as a man, as a teacher, as prophet and martyr, as "the way, the truth and the life," had indeed been shielded through the ages, by enthusiasts of the Churches, even in their perverted doctrines, and amid mutual animosities; but it was not too much to say that the so-called Christianity of the Churches, even of the simplest, had veiled away from too many hearts the true Jesus, who as such was their Saviour, and as such only. The limitations of every opinionated Church of human manufacture—neither God nor Jesus ever made one!—always with its several views and claims and images and pretensions, had all just to be left behind, in trusting and loving personal abandonment to the Life in God, and in Humanity. Every pilgrim must resolutely leave behind him the fascinations and seductions of every Church of this world, and know nothing but his Master and his God, and his brother in every neighbour.

It had always been the force of personal character and will and example and service and of soul added to soul in the same great cause of life, that had produced and reproduced the capital miracle of this world, the one true Church of all the lovers of the Lord, by whatever name he or they might be called. That cause of causes constituted the very following of Jesus, of St. Paul, of St. Columba, of St. Boniface, of Wyclif, of Luther, of Channing, of Parker, and of all their several congregations of worshippers and fellow-labourers. That Church alone was the ideal Catholic, the ideal Open Brotherhood, which had undertaken to overcome the world, and would do so.

So he appealed to his brothers of every Unitarian Association to abandon once for all their dogmatic badge and all non-natural interpretations of it; and not to be ashamed to avow their great principle, and declare with full free hearts and wills what each really meant—not doctrinal protestation, but just congregation for the promotion of Religion, owning no master but Jesus, and no name but that of children of his Father and theirs, no union but that of self-forgetting love for Him and them. They might be the most distinctly personal, the most purely Christian of all combinations for worship and service, and why stain their standards, why polute their appeal by a Sectarianism which in their hearts they habitually hated and disclaimed, which from Christianity and from Religion they had learned to loathe?

And to his brothers of any Conference he appealed, to fling down all the varied banners of their unhallowed orthodoxies, and all their mechanical pageantry of organisation, and gather, as occasion served, simply (as Mr. Armstrong had invited them) for welcome and fellowship and conference, for religion and devotion, for worship and service, and for the love of God and Jesus, and for the seeking and keeping of every near or distant neighbour.

While uniformity and compulsion were tyranny and apostacy, and nonconformity and nonsubscription might denote courage and avowal and even martyrdom, yet those were not in themselves virtues. To rest in nonconformity and nonsubscription too often meant to forget alike fellowship and religion; they must own no manufactured union, but that only which was stronger than intellect or will or handicraft—no union but that of the Open Brotherhood, the very bond of the Universe! They must have no organisation but that of self-surrender in mutual counsel and mutual service for every need. That was the great lesson of sympathy; it was the Christianity of Jesus.

LITERATURE.

MR. JACKSON'S "MARTINEAU."*

Those of our readers, and they will be very many, who turn eagerly to every announcement of a biography of Dr. Martineau, must, we fear, be prepared for disappointment when they open Mr. Jackson's substantial volume. It has been a labour of love, for years conscientiously and enthusiastically given, and the result must be received with respect and sympathy; but we feel bound to say at once and quite frankly that it adds nothing to us. What we are waiting for is a life of our great teacher that shall give us fresh insight into his mind, and bring us nearer, not only to the strength, but to the tender graciousness and beauty of his spirit; this is what we hope for, chiefly through the self-revelation of his letters, and some more intimate account of his personal life than has hitherto been possible, but of this nothing will be found in Mr. Jackson's pages; it is what we may confidently look for in the Life on which Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton are engaged.

Mr. Jackson's work was to have been published in two volumes, but he was, we think, acting on sound advice, when he decided to compress the two into one, although it involved the omission of "a lengthy and toilsome discussion of the 'Types of Ethical Theory.'" The result is a volume of 447 pages, which is divided into three books, the first containing nine chapters of biography, the second treating of "The Religious Teacher," the third of "The Philosopher of Religion." But these last two books are not simply studies of Dr. Martineau; they are, at the same time, the author's study of Dr. Martineau's subjects, along his lines, and the work of a devoted follower, yet largely the utterance of his own mind rather than that of his "master," which, in a book with such a title, we cannot but regard as a serious error of judgment. Mr. Jackson's chapters can hardly be commended as a concise and helpful introduction to the study of Dr. Martineau's great books. And when we turn to the chapter on "The Christian Theologian," and especially the section which deals with Dr. Martineau's ideal of church fellowship, we are astonished that Mr. Jackson should not have submitted these pages before publication to some one familiar with the history of our English churches; it would have spared him from the incorporation in his work of a most grotesque passage of apocryphal history.

We are told (on p. 208) that English Presbyterianism, into whose ministry Dr. Martineau was ordained (Mr. Jackson does not distinguish between the English and the Irish Churches), beginning with the severer type of doctrine of Baxter's time, had by the beginning of the present century reached the confines of Unitarianism, "or rather we might more accurately say, while yet prevailingly Trinitarian, Unitarianism had become quite common within its ranks." But then "an effort was made to bring the organisation to a declaredly Trinitarian basis," which came to a climax at the Salter's Hall Convention in London, in 1819, when these Presbyterians, in spite of their prevailing dislike of Unitarianism, would not part with their liberty, and refused the doctrinal test! Mr. Jackson is quite unconscious that he is a hundred years wrong in his date, not to speak of other things, and calmly goes on to another incident, declaring that, "six years after the Salter's Hall Convention, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed" at Essex Hall, and proceeds to contrast the character of the two "conventions." With the best intentions, and with complete sympathy with Dr. Martineau's ideal, Mr. Jackson makes such sad havoc of his case. This is the worst, but not the only instance of the want of accurate knowledge which leaves a most unfortunate mark on this section of Mr. Jackson's work.

* "James Martineau: a Biography and Study." By A. W. Jackson, A.M. Longmans, Green and Co. 12s. 6d.

But our interest naturally centres in the earlier chapters of biography. They have been written with care, and after personal converse with Dr. Martineau himself and the members of his family. "It was my privilege," writes Dr. Jackson, "to make his acquaintance in extreme age," and the biographical section concludes with the following passage :—

The thought of meeting one so crowned with honours was attended with natural anxieties. Two hands extended in welcome, a gracious smile, a cordial word, and all anxieties were gone. The happy discovery was made that his greatness was of the kind that lifts but does not overpower. Of the quiet hours spent with him I need not tell. Suffice that they fixed in my mind the impression of a sage, a hero, and a saint; of one who might converse with Plato, and dare with Luther, and revere with Tauler; an habitué of the Academy, who thrilled to the Categorical Imperative, and who knelt at the cross.

Yet with all his enthusiasm and profound veneration for the man of whom he writes, Mr. Jackson's narrative does not kindle to what we feel assured must have been in his heart. If it ever rises to eloquence, it is in such a passage as the above or in this, which speaks of Dr. Martineau's style :—

It is a style wonderfully varied to express a many-sided man—the scholar and thinker who must feel the rock beneath him as he builds, and see his walls reared true; the man, too, of aspirations that want a temple and of affections that want a home; so different from that, for instance, of Herbert Spencer, also a "physiognomy," but which expresses only a clear and passionless intellection. The latter we might liken to the Bank of England, solid, massive, but on whose granite cubes we see no suggestion of a heaven or a soul. The former we might liken to the dear and venerable Abbey, built on granite foundations and its walls reared true, but also with towers and arches which tell of a various aspiration and rapture and ideal.

For the most part the biographical chapters have left with us the impression of a conscientious and somewhat plodding narrative, with some fulness and yet telling only what we knew before, and lacking proportion, as when ten pages are devoted to a study of Dr. Martineau's teachers at Manchester College, the Revs. Charles Wellbeloved and John Kenrick (taken by Mr. Jackson in the inverted order of their age and standing in the College), and when he goes fully into the correspondence which opened the Liverpool Unitarian Controversy of 1839, but has nothing to say of Dr. Martineau's life-long devotion to the cause of Domestic Missions, and in the chapters on the Liverpool ministry only mentions Mr. Thom in connection with the Unitarian controversy.

One error in the biography we may point out. Mr. Jackson speaks of the joint-pastorate with Mr. Tayler at Little Portland-street as having lasted for ten years, until Mr. Tayler's death; as a matter of fact it ended in two years, and from Christmas, 1860, until his resignation in 1872, Dr. Martineau had undivided charge of the pulpit.

But it is an ungracious task to point out mistakes in a book in which we should so gladly have found much to admire and enjoy, and we will now only quote in conclusion one other passage, in which Mr. Jackson is referring to Martineau's first appointment as professor in Manchester College :—

It is with peculiar interest that we look back from the nonogenarian sage to the thinker of thirty-five. It was at the opening of the October session of the College that he gave his introductory lecture, in which we may divine something of the spirit of Sir Galahad going forth in search for the San Greal. Easily and naturally, but with a sustained eloquence, he told his hearers how philosophy arose, outlined the vast tracts it was his hope to explore, enjoined the severe method by which alone philosophical studies can be successfully pursued, and justified the claim of Philosophy to be the promoter of man's higher welfare.

We may add that the book contains two beautiful portraits, but without any information as to what they are. The first, as frontispiece, is a reproduction of the engraving from a portrait by C. Agar in 1846, published in Manchester; the second is even more beautiful, the face with which we are now so familiar, taken from Emslie's portrait of 1888. They represent, therefore, successively, the author of the "Endeavours" and of the "Study of Religion."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In the Nineteenth Century of this month one of the most valuable articles is that by Sir Charles Elliott, Chairman of the Finance Committee of the London School Board, and a leading member of the Moderates, on "Extravagance and Economy in the London School Board." The article concludes, it is true, with an appeal for the support of Moderate candidates at the coming election, on the ground that they will encourage Voluntary schools and protect them from what he regards as "the undue competition and harassment to which they are liable at the hands of the Progressive party," but the bulk of the article consists of an able and impartial statement of the position and policy of the Board in face of the growing needs of education in the metropolis and a defence of it against charges of extravagant expenditure, which along the main lines of the work he shows to be altogether groundless. Professor Max Müller, of whose very serious illness we are grieved to hear, contributes the second of his articles on the Religions of China, the subject being "Taoism." Lady Wimborne, writing on "Ritualism and the General Election," is confident of the Protestantism of the bulk of the English people, but fears that a Ritualist clergy may succeed in wrecking the Establishment. The Warden of Merton, in an attractive article, shows what are the advantages and what the dangers to England in being a "Nation of Amateurs." There is much sound sense in the article by Dr. H. H. Almond, the Headmaster of Loretto, on "The Breed of Man," starting from Herbert Spencer's plea for a nation of healthy animals as a first condition of national prosperity, and urging more practical attention to the laws of health as of Divine ordinance, which ought to be the first and paramount subject of instruction by precept, habit, and example in every school and in every home, and a code to be religiously observed in mills, shops, and offices. Such care for the health of physical life may certainly be insisted on as a religious duty, without setting the animal above the moral man, or setting soundness of body in any way before integrity of character.

The Contemporary opens with an article by Mr. J. B. Robinson on "The South African Settlement," and contains also a trenchant indictment by Mr. J. A. Hobson of "The Proconsulate of Milner." The Rev. W. W. Peyton contributes the first of two or more articles on "The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation," in which he seeks to make clear the true significance of suffering in a creation, the whole of which "is of God and His Love." The value of this contribution towards a solution of the great mystery we shall be able to estimate better when the articles are completed. The Count de Soissons writing on "The New French Idealism" speaks very highly of the work of Charles Secretair as initiating a moral revival, and draws special attention to some younger followers of his, and notably Charles Wagner. "Everyone who cherishes the moral welfare of humanity," says the Count, "should read Wagner," and quotes from his last book, "La Vie Simple," a plea for "simplicity of life arising from simplicity of spirit and penetrated by one thought—a thought of God—and inspired by one desire and one hope—the desire and hope of God's Kingdom."

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY.

Sir,—Kindly allow me, through your columns, to call the attention of all ministers and lay-preachers to the fact that Nov. 25 has been selected as Temperance Sunday. It is hoped that sermons dealing with one or more phases of Temperance reform may be preached in all our churches, and addresses delivered in the Sunday-schools.

The Committee of this Association are taking part in the Pledge Signing Campaign now being inaugurated among the Nonconformist churches, and count upon active assistance from all engaged in religious instruction.

A campaign in favour of Sunday Closing of Public-houses will also be actively pursued during the winter, and it is hoped there may be found sufficient zeal in the welfare of the people among the members of the new Parliament to ensure the passing of a Bill in favour of Sunday Closing, and also one prohibiting the sale of drink to children. If ministers and Sunday-school teachers will arrange meetings of their congregations and friends, with the view of promoting these objects, much good may be accomplished.

I shall be glad to send to any inquirers copies of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's powerful appeal. J. Bredall, Joint Hon. Sec., Essex Hall Temperance Association.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

Sir,—Will you please allow me to make a correction in my "Provincial Letter" of last week? On page 668, second column and fourth line, I said of Pendlebury "it was the forerunner of Swinton." From what I said about Swinton just previously it will be seen to be a slip. Pendlebury came after Swinton, and was merely a private chapel provided by a well-to-do member of Cross-street Chapel for the use mainly of his own family.

May I also say that in putting the income of the Manchester District Association as £577 last year I did not include a grant of £112 from the British and Foreign.

I am constrained to offer this explanation because I find people are surprised that we seem to be spending so little more than the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association and the East Cheshire Christian Union, both of which do include in their statements of income much larger grants from the B. and F. Charles Roper.

OBITUARY.

MR. CALEB SPIBY.

There passed away, at Aberdeen, on the 9th inst., in his eighty-second year, a veteran Unitarian, Mr. Caleb Spiby, late of Hull. He was retired from active life and lived with his son, the loyal treasurer of the Aberdeen Unitarian Church. Though feeble in body, he had no organic disease, and showed activity of mind to the last. He passed away without pain, rather suddenly, but quite serenely. He was born at Gainsborough, and baptised into the National Church there. But being of an inquiring and rationalistic turn of mind he thought himself out of the dogmas which he was trained to believe, and under the influence of the Rev. Thomas Worsley, of Gainsborough, found himself in the Unitarian connection. On his removal to Hull in the thirties he became an active member of the Bowl-alley congregation, the Rev. Edward Higginson being minister. He became superintendent of the Sunday-school, and a member of committee. For forty-five years he was a faithful member of the Hull Congregation, doing what he could heartily for its edification. He was always a seeker for truth, and acquired much intelligence. His bent of mind took him into mechanics, and he started the manufacture of oil cakes. His native genius found scope in his mill, but commercial circumstances were against him. He had a sterling integrity, a genial humour, and was withal a devoutly religious man. He belonged to the thoughtful, sturdy, devoted class from which civil and religious liberty and progress sprang and by which they are conserved and developed. His wife died two years ago. He is survived by his only son, Mr. T. M. Spiby, who is highly respected as a citizen of Aberdeen. A. W.

FRATERNAL GREETINGS.

The members of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, in a letter signed by Mrs. John Tweedy, the President, offered cordial greeting to the Church Congress at its recent meeting in Newcastle. The following is the latter part of the letter:—"With you we exist to draw men's thoughts continually toward the things that are eternal, to give the lie to materialism and all its doings, to proclaim the Kingdom of God upon the earth. Before us, as before yourselves, lie the great unchurched masses whose religious instincts we are anxious to awake. On us, as upon you, has been laid the charge of proclaiming the gospel of love. With so much in common it would be strange indeed if we could not join with the rest of the religious community in extending a hearty welcome to so important a gathering as yours. While we owe much to the inspiration gathered from the great teachers of your Church, and are for ever thankful for the lives and teachings of such illustrious men as Butler, Maurice, Kingsley, Robertson, Stanley, and others no less honoured, we feel that in James Martineau much of our debt has been repaid. As those who share his theology and who look upon it as a worthy aim to emulate his devoutness and truly Christian manner of life, remembering also his love for that 'Church of England' from which he, like most of us, felt himself unhappily an exile, we extend our fraternal sympathies and beseech God's blessing on your endeavours."

A courteous reply from Archdeacon Emery, hon. sec. of the Congress, was subsequently received.

To the Congregational Union meeting this week at Newcastle the members of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Church Association also sent a letter of cordial greeting, in which it was said:—

"It will not appear inappropriate that ours should be amongst the many greetings awaiting you, when you learn that amongst the twelve churches in our Association is that known as the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, which is the present representative of the old Hanover-square Chapel, the first Nonconformist place of worship in Newcastle. Its list of ministers commences with the Rev. W. Durant, who was ejected from All Saints' in 1662. Sharing with you the same form of Church government, but with even less of denominational organisation than yourselves, we find our experiences continually paralleled in yours, and are often able to profit by your methods and traditions. We rejoice to notice that the principle of absolutely open trust deeds is gradually receiving favour in your midst. It is a principle that has been practically our rule, and in no instance have we ever had occasion to regret the non-insertion of theological definitions. Having so much in common, and sharing so frequently the inspirations of our respective leaders and thinkers, we feel that while, for a time at least, we must run our separate courses, there is so much sympathy between the two groups of churches that we are really one in heart and aim. Because we realise in you part of the army warring for the things of the spirit against the powers of materialism, an army in which we also serve, we give you a most hearty welcome and pray for the Divine blessing on all your labours."

The letter was presented by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, and received with applause, but owing to lack of time was not read.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I was looking one day at the pictures in a great gallery in Florence, that old and beautiful city, where so many artists and poets have lived. I stopped a long time before one picture in particular. It is rather faded now, and no wonder, as it is more than four hundred years since it was painted. The artist simply called it "Spring," but I fancy he must have had many thoughts in his mind besides Spring the season. On the left side of the picture is a group of girls, dancing gracefully and holding up their hands to the trees overhead, as if they were rejoicing to see the fresh green leaves and blossoms. On the right hand is another group, and in the middle of the picture is a tall and beautiful woman, crowned with flowers and holding garlands in her arms. She is, of course, meant to represent "Spring" in its full beauty. In the right hand group are three figures. One, shivering, pale, almost blue with the cold, is creeping from behind the trees, blowing sharp cold wind from his mouth, and looking extremely disagreeable and uncomfortable. He is evidently meant for March; does he not remind you a little of an unkind person? Next comes a pretty girl, dancing along, and letting nothing but sweet flowers fall from her mouth, and the flowers are falling right into the lap of the third figure, another girl, who, with sweet smiling looks, holds up the soft folds of her dress to catch the blossoms. These two, you can easily guess, are April and May; April throwing her sweet buds and flowers into the lap of May, who comes close up to the noble-looking lady in the centre of the picture.

I sat and looked long at this old painting, and thought what a pretty story someone might make about it; but as I am not a story-writer, I can only tell you what I saw and a little about what I thought. I thought of the children I loved at home in England, and I hoped they would grow up to be like April and May, and shower the sweet flowers of loving words and deeds about them all their lives. God does not give to everyone a lovely face and form, but is not that person always beautiful to us from whom we are sure of hearing nothing but kind and gentle words?

So the children should try to be like April in that old picture, and let nothing but flowers fall from their lips, and then their faces will grow sweet and smiling like May, who, in the painting, looks so joyously happy. As for poor shivering March, no need to warn the children not to be like him! he makes himself and others miserable by blowing those cold, cutting winds, which are so like sharp unkind words.

Let us all try, then, with God's help, to live such sweet cheerful lives that we may help our parents, our teachers, and friends by strewing flowers as we go along our daily paths. Even the youngest children may help far more than they know to make sunshine in their homes and to drive away the clouds of vexation and coldness.

THE SHEFFIELD BICENTENARY.

The congregation of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, are to be congratulated on the happy celebration of the Bicentenary of their venerable place of worship—venerable in age and in its noble traditions, but vigorous still in its adaptation to modern needs and opportunities, and in young life which holds the promise of the future. The celebrations, which have been marked by the publication of a history of the chapel by the Rev. J. E. Manning, already noticed in these columns, began on Sunday morning, when Mr. Manning preached a special sermon of commemoration, from the text, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II. Cor. iii. 17). In this sermon, which was well reported in Monday's Sheffield Independent, he dwelt upon the past history of the congregation, and particularly on the eminent services of the Rev. Timothy Jollie, who was minister when the chapel was built, two hundred years ago, and to whom a memorial tablet was unveiled on Thursday, perpetuating the inscription on his tombstone, which time was fast obliterating. Mr. Manning further spoke of the great privilege they inherited in the Open Trust, on which the chapel was founded, and described the faith of simple Unitarian Christianity at which they had arrived. Nether Chapel, which was founded early in last century by seceders from Upper Chapel, also had originally an Open Trust, and the history of the two congregations furnishes a significant contrast. For at the beginning of the present century, the congregation at Nether Chapel, like many other Independent churches, holding strongly to the old Calvinistic faith, and dreading perhaps danger from such heresy as had infected their neighbours, exchanged their freedom for bondage to a strict Calvinistic trust. While therefore Upper Chapel remains devoted to the larger faith, the closed trust at Nether Chapel, at the end of another century, must surely have become to the worshippers there either a mill-stone round the neck of their spiritual progress, or a skeleton kept secretly in the congregational cupboard.

We publish this week a report of the very successful autumn meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held at Sheffield in connection with the Bicentenary celebrations, and marking the cordial sympathy which exists between the Free Churches of our fellowship and the work of the Association in furtherance of the cause of liberal religion. Of Thursday's Bicentenary meetings we must reserve our report until next week, and here will only add one or two thoughts suggested by the Conference on Wednesday afternoon, opened by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones on "Missionary Needs and Opportunities." The call is to Upper Chapel at the beginning of another century of its history, and to every one of the Free Churches of our fellowship. It was pressed home by several speakers. Freedom furnishes the great opportunity of our religious life, but of itself it will avail nothing. The great need is of a deepened sense of the worth of religion, and of living union in religious worship. Too often attachment to a congregation is a matter of inherited feeling, of personal relations, or interest in preaching; but on those things a church cannot be built. The one true foundation is that which is stated in the Trust of such Free Churches, simply the worship of God in freedom of spirit, and if our churches are to take their rightful place in the religious life of England in the coming century, it must be through a new awakening of that sense of the need of God, and of what is given to humble worshippers and faithful servants of His truth.

When there is in a church the strength and joy of such a union, in the hidden life of the spirit, it becomes clear that there is no greater treasure to be gained in the whole world, and no greater cause to which the noblest manhood and womanhood may be devoted. To make a strong and living Church, to enjoy its privileges, to do its work, to minister of its spiritual blessings to the needy and hungry of heart, to extend its influence and multiply such centres of beneficent and divine activity for the furtherance of the Kingdom of God on earth, is then seen to be an over-mastering call, and out of this must spring once more the true missionary spirit. So the fire must be kindled, the fire which is of God, which will burn up our conceit, and every sin that is a canker at the heart of our common life; and in the flame of a new zeal we shall be led out in humble self-forgetfulness, in joyful enthusiasm, in the strength of God and the fellowship of Christ to the service of our fellow-men.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMN MEETING.

The autumn meeting of the Association was held at Sheffield on Wednesday, in connection with the Bicentenary celebrations at Upper Chapel, which were held on the following day. The deputation from the Association consisted of Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. (President), and the Revs. James Harwood, W. G. Tarrant, and W. Copeland Bowie (secretary). There was a large attendance of friends from a distance as well as of members of the Sheffield congregations, including the Revs. J. E. Manning (Upper Chapel), J. Ellis (Upperthorpe), E. S. Anthony, J. Birks, E. C. Cook, V. D. Davis, J. Fox, J. H. Green, A. Hall, C. Hargrove, E. S. Hicks, E. R. Hodges, E. C. Jones, W. Lindsay, W. Lloyd, E. W. Lummis, S. G. Preston, P. Prime, H. Rawlings, W. W. Robinson, T. W. Scott, A. C. Smith, J. K. Smith, E. L. H. Thomas, H. Thomas, C. Wellbeloved, W. Whitaker, and Joseph Wood; Messrs. Grosvenor Talbot, Alfred Beckett, Edward Layton, Edward Bramley, James Laycock, William Laycock, H. J. Morton, J. B. Wostinholm, Richard Fisher, Albert J. Hobson, Henry R. Bramley, Alfred Hobson, F. W. Smith, George W. Hunt, E. E. Chitty, E. S. Robinson, G. C. Snaith, I. S. Lister, W. Holbrook, C. Stainer, J. Scott, W. Garnett, W. H. Woodcock, and T. Birchall.

THE CONFERENCE.

The proceedings opened with a luncheon for the delegates in Channing Hall, after which a Conference was held, under the presidency of the Rev. J. E. Manning, who offered a cordial welcome to the visitors to Upper Chapel, and a paper was read by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, on "Missionary Opportunities and Needs in the Yorkshire District."

During the present century, Mr. Jones said, their churches in Yorkshire had made no great effort on an organised scale to propagate their principles, and they had not kept pace with the immense growth of the population. Individual churches had rendered great service to the religious life of their immediate neighbourhood and to the cause of civil and religious liberty, but that was not enough, and in itself was a strong reason for establishing more of such centres of healthy religious life. Collectively they had failed of their responsibility, and had neglected great missionary opportunities. He proceeded to specify a number of districts thickly populated, which they had not yet touched, and where they might establish churches. The people were now more instructed, there was no longer the need for negative criticism, but great need for their positive gospel of Fatherhood and Brotherhood and salvation by character. Their own existence depended on their taking hold of this work. If they did not go forward, they must decay and perish. There was need among them of a solemn sense of responsibility, to make their convictions effective in religious life. Those who knew the meaning and power of their Unitarian gospel must be eager to share it with others. And they needed economy of labour, which would be greatly helped by the appointment of a minister-at-large for the county, to break new ground, and sustain the present efforts in their scattered churches. Union for this common object would kindle new enthusiasm in their midst. They really needed an income of £800 to do effectually the missionary work to which they were called. Other churches had their Twentieth Century Funds. Could they not raise such a Fund for missionary purposes? God had laid on them a mighty trust, of which they must prove themselves worthy.

Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, President of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, opened the discussion, and said that he thought their partial failure was due to the fact that the old Calvinism was now dead, and people did not feel the same need to come out from other churches to them. While he sympathised warmly with the desire to extend the number and influence of their churches he thought they must first see that their present churches were better supported.

The Rev. J. Ellis said that their first need was of the missionary spirit, and then the means for further work would be forthcoming. They must cultivate a deep and earnest religious spirit in their young people, and consecrate their young enthusiasm to that missionary work. A missionary agent for the county could render great service.

The Rev. E. R. Hodges urged the raising of a missionary fund, and men would be found.

The Rev. H. Rawlings supported the idea of a missionary agent from his experience of the London Provincial Assembly, and because such a minister would be able to concentrate whatever efforts their settled ministers were able to make by setting them free for missionary service.

The Rev. J. Birks thought it would be better to set down ministers in one or two places rather than have a minister-at-large.

Sir John Brunner expressed his sympathy with every effort to strengthen the churches and establish new ones, having himself known what it was to be cut off from such opportunities of worship.

The Rev. E. S. Anthony referred to what the Southern Association with their few churches were doing for a twentieth century fund.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie urged that it was unwise to be too hasty in building churches in new districts. Where an effort had proved abortive it was better to abandon it and go where the people were, with living needs and determination to work and give for the cause. But while they should be cautious in the erection of buildings, there was no excuse for leaving any great district without opportunity of hearing their message.

The Rev. C. Hargrove was convinced that money would be given where it was clearly shown what work was to be done. Their first need was to be possessed by the missionary spirit. They must have faith in their gospel—aiming not merely to make Unitarians, but to give to people the true religious life which possessed themselves.

The Conference closed with hymn and benediction.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

At four o'clock service was held in the Upper Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, who also preached the sermon, of which an abstract is given below.

The anthem, "The Lord is my strength" (Smallwood) was sung. The collection for the funds of the Association amounted to £14 7s. 9d.

THE SERMON—"AMBASSADORS OF GOD."

Taking for text 2 Cor. v. 20, "We are ambassadors on behalf of Christ, as though God were intreating by us: we beseech on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God," Mr. Hargrove said that they could not make a less claim than that. It was better to reproach themselves with unworthiness than degrade themselves from their high calling. They had taken the Christian name and allied themselves in a Christian church, and thereby made public profession that they accepted Christ's teaching and owned Christ's principles. They might be unfaithful, their stewardship was not therefore null; they might be useless, their vocation and their duty remained.

The very fact of their meeting there for worship at such a time was a declaration on behalf of Christ, a protest against the practical denial of God's rights in all things and over all. They were witnesses to an unseen order, heralds of an unrecognised sovereignty, agents to reconcile the world with God. Acknowledging Him to be Law, Love, Light, they whose brightest day was twilight, who were so often over-mastered by self-love, whose daily confession was of wrong-doing, were yet His ambassadors to speak in His Name, to win men to His Service, to declare His Law. Such was the true function of a church, the same whatever its name, or its theory of the relations of man and God—a work expressed in the prayer which a great teacher of their own had put into the mouths of many, that "through the din of earthly interests and the storm of human passions it may make the still small voice of the Spirit inly felt."

Such being the purpose of the congregation assembling in that chapel, where for two hundred years with more or less faithfulness that end had been kept in view, and the doctrine and forms of worship preferred had ever been held of inferior importance to the spirit of divine service, how came it that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was there to hold its autumn meeting, and make common cause with a church boasting freedom from doctrinal obligation? The objects of the Association were distinctly laid down from the beginning. It bore the Unitarian name, its first object was to diffuse the principles of Unitarian Christianity. If the founders of that congregation had similarly determined the ends to which it was to be directed, that friendly meeting would certainly not have taken place.

What, then, was the attraction subsisting between the two societies, which assured to the Association a welcome to Upper Chapel, and made them all feel that Bicentenary to be a welcome event in the history of Unitarian Christianity? How had it come about that a chapel which by accident or design was left free should come to associate itself with an institution for the promotion of a definite form of Christianity? Or, again, how could those avowing themselves Unitarian Christians make their home in a Free Church?

The story of two hundred years' development from Calvinistic Dissent to their present advanced position was a deeply significant episode in the history of religion. Accepting the fact, he asked the meaning of it. It was to churches whose trust deeds had contained no statement of doctrine that the Unitarian Association owed its existence and its continued support. The same hearty welcome which the Association met with on that occasion it would receive in almost every one of the 365 places of worship, which were allied to one another by profession of a great principle rather than by confession of the same faith. Unitarianism and Religious Liberalism were not associated by reason of a temporary controversy; they assimilated because they were really the same, and were but different aspects of one disposition of mind towards the problems of the higher life. Unitarianism was in great part a denial, but it denied just what was inconsistent with and subversive of the principles of Liberalism. Let it be agreed that doctrine was of comparatively little importance, that worship acceptable to God might be found under the dome of St. Peter, or at Little Bethel or in the synagogue, that it was by life, not by creed, that men were judged, yet that argument involved the denial of all those doctrines against which Unitarians protest, and the assertion of just those doctrines they uphold.

"Ambassadors on behalf of Christ," to proclaim the Kingdom of God, it was part of their mission to protest against false doctrine and unauthorised claims. The temptation had always been strong to rest content with the positive aspects of Christianity, on the importance of which all were agreed. But did those positive aspects include, or did they not include, the worship of Christ, his mediation with God, atonement through his blood, and much else, which was all important or altogether false?

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and strength." That, said Jesus, was the law and the prophets. It was the whole of duty and the whole of revelation. If a man did that, he had done all and had no more to learn. Then why not preach it, and leave alone all those questions which divided them? But they were met at once with the preliminary question, Who is God? and why should we love Him? And lo, on the threshold of the temple they were stayed to engage in controversy.

"Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." So Jesus prefaced the utterance of that great commandment. But if it were true that there were three persons in the One Lord, and each had his distinct office, their love was divided and perplexed. If the Son was kind to all, but the Father unapproachable save through him, could they help loving the Son even as they feared the Father. Their creed must affect both their worship and their life, and therefore those who accepted a certain pattern of life and worship as truly Christian were bound to maintain a creed corresponding thereto.

They would gladly be Christians only and know no other name, and have no other argument of all their discourse than Christian affirmations. But their affirmations involved negations which they could not escape. So the younger Socinus had found it three hundred years ago. Implored by his friends to write something "concerning God and His Christ," that he might do what in him lay to overthrow the false doctrines which everywhere prevailed, he replied that it would be more satisfactory were he to treat of other matters directly conducive to piety, and little understood by men of their day, as were theological truths. Yet they continued to urge that nothing could be more useful to man or more serviceable to set forth the glory of God and this Christ than to set forth the truth in opposition to the inveterate prejudices of error which then obtained. So Socinus turned from admonitions of piety to expositions of divinity, and sorely did he suffer therefor in mind, body and estate. But his friends counselled him well, and he did a work in the world for the glory of God and the service of man which had lasted to that day. Greatly daring, he loosed the fetters with which the tradition of twelve hundred years had bound all Christian minds. He answered boldly questions which to ask was heresy and with inconceivable audacity joined his uncle and a few like-minded, to deny what a unanimous Christendom affirmed. Had he and his friends contented themselves to assert what all approved, and been silent about opinions which revolted the orthodox and scandalised the pious of their time, they had not been exiles and wanderers on earth; but then, should they of that present time have been free to preach, to write, or even to think as they would?

"We are ambassadors, on behalf of Christ." Was he God? Then should they bid all men worship, and themselves set lowliest example. Was he man? Then should they reprove, as he himself did, those who ascribed to him divine attributes. "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God." Was he one who more than any of his fellows read the mind of God and revealed it to them in clearer light than it was seen before? Then was it their office to repeat and enforce his teachings and steadily set themselves against whatever in practice or in theory was contrary thereto.

Good it was to live in peace with all men, to say so much as all were agreed upon and be silent of the rest. What man of good will would not prefer such a position and adopt it, if he had but himself to consider. But they were ambassadors, by public profession worshippers of God and followers of Christ. The word was not their own to speak or to withhold. What they believed they needs but say it, and what they disbelieved they were bound to disclaim it. Therefore did they take to themselves an unpopular name and espouse the cause of an insignificant minority, not because it pleased them to be singular, or that they were indifferent to the charm of a wider fellowship, but that they were not their own—they spoke as on behalf of Christ and for God, and might nothing add to or withhold of what to them was Truth.

After service tea was served in the Channing Hall, and there was a pleasant interval for social intercourse, before the evening meeting began at 7.30.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a well-attended public meeting was held in Montgomery Hall, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., in the chair.

After an opening hymn, the Rev. J. E. Manning offered a very cordial welcome to Sir John Brunner as President of the Association and to the other members of the deputation, and spoke of the great work the Association was doing throughout the country. He then referred to some current misapprehensions of Unitarianism, and particularly to a remark made in the Sheffield Independent by Mr. R. E. Leader, in a friendly review of his history of the Upper Chapel, in which the emergence of Unitarianism amid the theological changes of the congregation during the past 200 years was compared with the insinuation of Romanism into the Church of England. That, Mr. Manning pointed out, was not a fair comparison, for the action of the Romanisers was contrary to law, whereas Upper Chapel had a free trust, and the changes which took place were wholly justified.

The President acknowledged the welcome they had received as guests of the Upper Chapel congregation, and proceeded to speak of their work as Unitarians. One of their difficulties was, he thought, that they were too modest, and did not believe sufficiently in themselves. They could not put their faith before any intelligent set of people without a large proportion of them accepting it. Whether afterwards they would proclaim it, was another matter. But if they themselves did not proclaim it, how could they expect others to do so? Among laymen a feeling had even grown up that it was slightly vulgar to make any profession of religious belief. Unitarians must shake off that feeling, and proclaim themselves, and be always ready in friendly discussion to explain what they meant and what they were. He was inclined to think it well also to challenge public controversy, as had been done with good effect in Liverpool in 1839. He sympathised also, and in the same practical manner in which the Quaker sympathised £5 with some good cause, with the work of the Postal Mission, which circulated helpful literature. He should like to have a short popular history of the creeds written for circulation in that way, which would be useful to inquiring minds; and he would also like the world to know who had been Unitarians in the past—such men as Milton and Newton, Longfellow, Lowell, and Motley—it was a list of which any denomination a hundred times their number might be proud.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant referred humorously to the old distinction between the bulk of converted people and those who were soundly converted. They met many people who were in general sympathy with Unitarianism, and even among themselves there were many who regularly subscribed to their chapel, and attended not quite so regularly, but needed to be soundly converted. He appealed especially to those who had twenty-five years before them to see to it that when they came to celebrate the jubilee of their churches there should be something really to rejoice over. When they came to the year 1913 they would have something to celebrate, for when he looked back on what their fathers had suffered in vindication of their liberty to speak and worship according to conscience, he thought the act legalising Anti-trinitarianism made 1813 a great date in their history. Then 1819 was the year of Channing's great declaration of Unitarianism at Baltimore, and when they reached 1925 they would celebrate the centenary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. What would that be? Would it be a mere going back to ancient history, or a time when people would come together to thank God that they had had a part in that movement? They had no fixed creed, yet they could not help putting their ideas and faith into form, when they spoke to each other and with their brethren; and there were those among them who were reverently glad to go back to him whom they remembered in every year, and to take from his lips the principles they held dear. In the words of Jesus, the simple enunciation of spiritual principle in the Sermon on the Mount, the all-satisfying theology of the Lord's Prayer, the moral code of the two great commands, they found, sufficiently stated, the principles of Unitarian Christianity. People could understand these things; but they wanted to see what effect such faith had on their lives. That was where their responsibility lay. Every time one attracted to their thought on religious matters came into a church barely attended and furnished, with an atmosphere of chill and neglect, and coming into their circle found them disputing about names, and, after all their professions, found that the sum of their enthusiasm, he might well turn away dissatisfied, and might well say those people had a pearl of great price, but did not know its value. But if he should come to know something of the work of their Association he would realise better what their faith meant, and Mr. Tarrant proceeded to speak of the variety of its work, and appealed to the young people that they should become deeply attached to that glorious faith, that they might have religion, the safeguard of their lives, and the crown of all their efforts.

Mr. Grosvenor Talbot spoke of the noble men who had been Unitarians, and the work they had done for the country and in moulding the religious thought of the century. The Bible had been opened as a reasonable book, reverence had been made deeper, wider, reverence for God and Christ, for men and women, and for dumb beasts, of which there had been no thought before. In the new century they must take to heart that true religion, that reformed Christianity, and manifest it in their lives. If they acted up to their faith the people would accept the truth as they had never done before. He had great faith in the progress of the world. The golden age was not in the past, it was to come; and when they acted up to the religion they had received from their fathers the people would be happy and prosperous, they would know Christianity as good to live and to die by, to take into the market and for all time, and the true golden age would be come.

The Rev. C. Hargrove admitted that Unitarian was a negative term, meaning disbelief in the Trinity, and that was a disadvantage which they had to accept. But a negation had nothing in it, and if that had been all that their Unitarianism meant they would have had no Church and no Association. But the negative implied a positive. So Protestant meant the denial of the claims of the Catholic Church to authority, but with that went recognition of the Bible as the only authority, the very Word of God. And so behind the Unitarian rejection of the Trinity was the assertion of the right of the individual, and the duty to judge for himself according to reason and conscience. That judgment must not be barred by texts, or by superior numbers, or by any authority of great names. A man was just himself, and for himself he was bound to judge, by the light which was from God alone. And with that great affirmative principle went the conviction that man has direct communication with God. Such was their principle. It was not so easy as the Protestants' appeal to the Bible, but that could not be helped. They had simply to hold to the truth. With that principle they held to the great positive truths of religion the Fatherhood, and Christ's teaching of human brotherhood, and eternal hope. So they would be judged in the coming century, according as they made men by whom the world's work was done, which was the work of the Kingdom of God, or failed because they had no great faith.

The Rev. J. Harwood said that connection of their autumn meeting with the bicentenary of Upper Chapel was a good thing as showing that there was nothing inconsistent between their past two hundred years of history and the support of the Association. They honoured the fathers of former generations. The eighteenth century was regarded as a matter of fact uninspired time; but when they looked at those old meeting-houses, and saw those quiet men making a stand for freedom, they had a different feeling about it. That was a fact of which they had a right to be proud; and they had to carry the same spirit into their own work under changed circumstances. As those others were promoters of political freedom, so it might be that now the cause of theological and religious reform would be promoted by the light kept burning in their meeting-houses throughout the country, which depended on the fidelity of those who dared to be in the right with two or three, simply standing by the truth. Speaking of the work of their Association, which was quite consistent with the spirit of their fathers, he deprecated such gratuitous charges as were made against them, of seeking to impose their Unitarian shibboleth, and to drive out from among them all who would not accept it. In their work in the support of churches such questions never arose, and had no effect, direct or indirect, on their action. Whenever their advice was asked they advocated the principle of open trusts. Having dwelt further on the value of the Association's work, and especially as well adapted to meet the needs of India, he appealed for more generous support.

Mr. A. J. Hobson referred to what Dr. Brooke Herford had done in inducing members to double their subscriptions, and so greatly strengthening the work of the Association, and urged that they might now help in another way, by doubling the number of those who subscribed.

The Rev. W. C. Bowie also added a few words of warm acknowledgment to the congregation of Upper Chapel and the local committee for the most admirable arrangements which had been made for the meetings, and the meeting concluded with the hymn "Part in Peace," and the benediction pronounced by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones.

During the evening members of the Upper Chapel choir rendered two beautiful quartettes by Mendelssohn and Hatton.

On Thursday the special Bicentenary celebrations were held at Upper Chapel, of which we hope to have a fuller report next week. In the morning a commemoration service was held, and the Rev. Joseph Wood preached a sermon, which we shall publish in full. After lunch in Channing Hall a Bicentenary Conference was held, when addresses of great historical interest were given, and the day closed with a conversazione in Channing Hall.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The annual meetings of this Union were held in Manchester last Saturday. In the afternoon a service was conducted in Cross-street Chapel by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, who preached an impressive sermon from the text, Isaiah xiii. 12. He said that coming generations would surely recognise the nineteenth century as one of change and revolution, in business, in government, in literature and in science. There is an overthrow of old authority, a sweeping away of tradition. The whole point of view is altered; we not only see more, but we see it differently. It is not too much to say that for us the world, considered as a pageant, is a wholly different world to that which presented itself to our forefathers one hundred years ago. It could not be supposed that theology would not be affected by the change. New light has been thrown on ancient studies; the new doctrine of evolution, and a wider knowledge of other religions have given to the world new conceptions of God and man and of the soul's destiny. To-day our conception of the relation of God to the world is not that of imperialism but fatherhood, not that of Cæsar to his subjects, but that of Father to his children. Though the promoters of the French Revolution were sceptics, we owe them a great debt; they did not believe in God, but they believed in man. The democratic movement is on one of its sides humanitarian. The good of the great mass of the people is its be-all and end-all, and this has reacted on theology. To speak reverently and plainly, the democratic movement has humanised God. And this is but a return to the teaching of Jesus.

Immediately after the service a business meeting was held, when interesting and encouraging reports were read by the secretary, the Rev. B. C. Constable, and the ministers of assisted churches. A forward movement is anticipated somewhat on the lines of that carried on by the Manchester District Association. There is ouly one station in the Union without a settled minister—namely, Boston Mills. The finances are healthy, and show a slight balance. The Rev. H. E. Dowson was re-elected president; Mr. T. H. Gordon, treasurer; the Rev. B. C. Constable, secretary; and Mr. J. F. Hamilton, plan and financial secretary.

After tea in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, a public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Mr. John Dendy, president of the Provincial Assembly, in the chair, and the general subject was "Our Unitarian Message to the People." At intervals music was rendered by a very able quartette of vocalists, with Mr. Herbert Walker as accompanist.

The Chairman said that it is one and the same God whom all the Churches worship if they differ in the way of describing the Godhead, one and the same Jesus whom they bid men to follow, though they differ as to the best way of following him, and the great points of agreement surely overshadow the points of difference. If our Unitarian message is to insist on the fundamentals all well and good. Are these days in which we can afford to base our message on points of disagreement?

We live in a time of reaction; we witness the destruction of many hopes. The nation surrenders itself to the widespread military spirit; it acquiesces in the extinction of free States and the unproductive increase in the instruments of war. This is a time when men think they can substitute clever speculation for honest work. It waits for a message; not that of an armed Kaiser or of a politician, but of one who lives in touch with God, and who can make us realise His presence too; one who loves man and hates his iniquities, and before whose eyes is ever the vision of life more beautiful than theology has pictured it hereafter. He believed such a one would arise; but whether, when he comes, he will find room in the Churches is another question; for he will have things to say which the Churches to-day will not utter. Such a one was Jesus. Do we doubt what line Jesus would take if we could lead him into the office of the fraudulent speculator, or in our streets at night in face of the great shame of womankind? These things are contrary to his spirit, and yet the Churches do not denounce them. The message the world is waiting for must deal with all its vices and abuses.

The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, spoke on "What we think of Christ and his teaching." He claimed that instead of their not believing in Christ the group of Churches they represented had held forth with clearness and distinctness as no other church in Christendom had done, the true teaching about the life, the character, the dignity and the work of Jesus. They had set forth the humanity of Jesus Christ, and had rediscovered him. They had gone away from creeds and dogmas and churches and ecclesiastics, back to the original story. They had read that story, saturated themselves with it, and let the spirit of it breathe through them and quicken them, so that they seemed to have lived and to be living in the atmosphere in which Jesus himself lived. And what had they found? Not the Almightly. They had felt themselves drawn to the man Jesus as they were drawn to nobody else. Something in him acted as a magnet, and they found it in the idea that he was their brother man. He was the fairest fruit of humanity up to that time. They called him brother, helper, teacher, and some had called him saviour. Many have testified that when they were in the depths, one hand out of the past was stretched forth and lifted them up—the hand of Jesus. Some have called him Master, in the sense of one who knows so much more than we do, and has gone through the gamut of human experiences, and has come forth more than conquerer. Who else among the sons of men stands so close to us as he does? A brother man tempted in all points as we are, feeling the sorrows of mankind, and showing us how to live and how to die; the most inspiring of all masters, the most tender of all teachers. Jesus seems to be the sum and crown and glory of our common humanity. He is the brother man for whom the world is waiting, and his message when once delivered will win the world to God. They were not disposed to say his teachings are not suitable to the present age; when they went to the root of his teaching every difficulty disappeared. The Golden Rule will never be out of date or out of place. If some great conflagration came upon the world and all the literature of Christianity should disappear save the one story of the Prodigal Son, the gospel in it taught by Jesus, the gospel of our common humanity, would be able to save the world to the uttermost. But there is another thing—the relation of Jesus to sin. The world in its Pharisaic moods is so good, it cannot bear to touch with its finger tips the sinner; and there is one story which stands out in the Gospel narrative—the woman taken in adultery—which shows his relation to sin, and which indicates what ours should be also. We are to embody in our characters his elevated principles, and form a Church so vast and comprehensive as to exclude no one, saint or sinner, a church with open doors, where the love of God prevails.

Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, of London, who was announced to speak, was unable to be present through illness. The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman next delivered an able address on "What we think of the Bible," and the Rev. Charles Roper, as representative of the Manchester District Association, also made a few remarks, After the singing of the doxology, the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. J. C. Street, and the proceedings terminated.

"THE HISTORY OF UPPER CHAPEL."

Sir,—In the review of this book in last week's Inquirer, there are a few mistakes which I should like to correct.

Possibly when we read "Jollie was ordained by Presbyterians" it is a printer's error, for your reviewer writes correctly above—namely, "by presbyters." These were Matthew Bloome and Rowland Haucock, who after being ejected with James Fisher, had established, as Hunter says, "a small church at Shiercliffe Hall in the Independent Model."

Your reviewer says: "When Upper Chapel was built the power of appointment (i.e. of a minister) was vested not in the congregation, but in the trustees." If the appointment of minister is "vested in the trustees," then it is true that this is not according to Congregational principles. The first trust of Nether Chapel (Independent), says the minister is to be chosen by "the trustees and members of the congregation in full communion." But, as a matter of fact, the Trust Deed of Upper Chapel says nothing whatever about the appointment of a minister, and the election of a minister has, in practice, always been put to the voice of the congregation.

The authority of the trustees lies in this: "That the said great building (then known as the New Chapel, afterwards Upper Chapel) shall be used as a public meeting-house for the worship and service of Almighty God, in such manner as the said trustees, or the major part of them, their heirs and assigns, shall for ever hereafter order or appoint." Hence all that is vested in the trustees is the building, to permit its use for certain purposes, or withhold its use if they think fit.

At the time of the secession what the Congregationalists maintained was this:—That the trustees, whatever their legal powers, were officers of the Church, bound to obey the direction of the Church of which they were members, whereas, contrary to a majority of the Church, they had carried out the wishes of a majority of the attendants. It is clear that this contention of the Congregationalists was supported by the consensus of opinion among ministers of the district. Yet according to the letter, and the spirit also, of their trust the trustees were perfectly justified in their proceedings. They could not have acted otherwise.

Dr. Philipps's name is as I give it here and in the History—not Phillips.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

In taking a general survey of the history of our congregations in the Midland district, from the beginning of the century now fast drawing to a close down to the present day, there are no very stirring incidents to record. On the other hand, one cannot but admire the quiet, unpretending and persistent manner in which the ministers of our congregations, many of them small and struggling with difficulties, have kept alive the cause of free and liberal religion in the face of persecution, opposition and indifference. Numerically, we are a small body now as we were one hundred years ago.

At the end of the eighteenth century there seem to have been about twenty-two places of worship in use in the Midland district calling themselves Unitarian or Presbyterian, and fourteen of these were in existence at the end of the seventeenth century. The twenty-two increased to thirty during the present century, but this number stands now at twenty-five, four of our smaller chapels having been closed, and one congregation having been merged in an already existing one. In addition to these some five or six smaller congregations have been gathered together in different parts of the district at various times during the last fifty years, but in none of these cases has the result been of a permanent character.

From some interesting statistics given in the "Essex Hall Year Book" it would appear that, since the year 1800, 131 fresh congregations have been founded in England and are still flourishing. Of this number the proportion belonging to the Midland District is very small—namely, seven. I see Mr. Roper, in his "Provincial Letter" in last week's Inquirer, says that in the Manchester District thirty-five churches have been erected or bought during the same period, though to-day, he says, there are twenty-four churches in the district. Continuing the comparison between the two districts, while the Midlands had twenty-two places of worship in the year 1800, in the year 1819, according to Mr. Roper's letter, the Manchester District had only twelve. Both districts to-day have nearly the same number—namely, Manchester twenty-four, the Midlands twenty-five.

The late Dr. Crosskey was interviewed a few years ago, and the result published in the Seed Sower for March 1893. He was asked: "What of the fact that our churches have not grown in Birmingham?" and the reply was:—

> That is only true with respect to the number of our churches. Those that exist have grown—they have grown in beneficent activities. Great have been the efforts, the work, the gifts of our people for the uplifting of the poor, the enlightenment of the dark, the comforting of the sorrowful; but since the best part of all this has been done in quiet, unknown ways—because we have sounded no trumpet before us—people think we have been stagnant. Our Birmingham churches have not, it is true, increased in number, but they have enormously increased in usefulness. They have done great things for the civilisation of Birmingham, and have been one of the most potent factors in bringing the blessings of knowledge, of purer tastes, of domestic happiness, within the reach of the masses.

This was written in 1893. At the end of the same year the first service was held in Small Heath, which ultimately led to the building of the church in Waverley-road, in that district of Birmingham. The church was opened for public worship in 1898, and had Dr. Crosskey been living it would have been a great joy to him to realise that our churches in Birmingham had grown in number as well as in usefulness. This new church is very different from the old meeting-houses erected in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries—the plain square brick buildings with high-backed pews and plastered walls. Having been accustomed in former years to worship in one of our older chapels, I remember being much struck with the difference between the old and the new the first time I attended a service in one of our more modern buildings. The difference is well known to all except the youngest of my readers, and especially to those who attended either the Old Meeting or the New Meeting in Birmingham, which are now superseded by modern churches with steeples, both built in the last half century. A new chapel was built at Banbury in 1850 to take the place of the old one. The chapels at Coseley, Dudley, Kingswood, and other places have been restored, and churches were built at West Bromwich in 1875 and Whitchurch in 1877.

Throughout the Midlands the principle has been put in practice with regard to our churches of the strong helping the weak. This was the essence of the scheme propounded by Dr. Martineau in his address on "Organisation," delivered at the Leeds Conference in 1888—namely, the organisation of the business affairs of our churches, not their spiritual life. In his own words, written seven years later: "The proposals which I ventured, without effect, to offer at Leeds, aimed at no more than such a business organisation. It was simply an answer to the question, 'What is to become of our poor congregations?' and gave the reply: 'The strong must help the weak; and this is how it may be done.'" However, Dr. Martineau's proposals were not entirely without effect, for steps were taken in the following year to place the Midland Christian Union on a basis "which shall render it representative of the Free Christian and Unitarian churches of the district." This has had the effect of increasing the attendance at the annual and autumnal meetings of the Union, and arousing a wider interest in their proceedings, which have also been made more attractive than before.

A further bond of union was created by the establishment of the Seed Sower in 1893, as a medium of communication between the members of "the churches of the Liberal faith in the Midland district" . . . "besides the spring and autumnal meetings of the Midland Christian Union." After passing through some years of small recognition, this interesting and useful little magazine has now become one of the settled institutions of the district, and has also been localised in some of our churches far beyond the Midlands. Before passing to another part of my subject, I must not omit to state that the Union is badly in want of funds.

Grants of money are made by the Committee annually to about one-third of the congregations included in the Union. Its income from subscriptions in 1866, the first year of its existence, was £88, and its income from the same source last year was £119, but it has been more than this in intermediate years. Some of the churches receiving aid are flourishing, but others are not, and the problem of how to infuse new life and energy into this latter class has to be solved in the near future.

Those who may be interested in the past history of the congregations in the Midlands cannot do better than read Mr. G. E. Evans' book called "Midland Churches," which was published last year by subscription, and contains very interesting and valuable information, some of which has been made use of in the course of this letter.

One of the most notable features of the religious work connected with our churches, and originated during the present century, is the Domestic Mission in large towns. Judging by the success of the movement in Birmingham, I think too much importance cannot be attached to the work of the missionary. Hurst-street Mission, Birmingham, was one of the earliest societies of this kind, founded in England after the visit of Dr. Tuckerman from America. This was started in 1840, and was followed four years later by the New Meeting Ministry to the Poor, now known as Fazeley-street Mission. In 1873 a Home Mission was established in connection with the Church of the Messiah, at the suggestion of Dr. Crosskey, in addition to the one already in operation, and a missionary was appointed to visit the homes of the Sunday scholars and investigate cases of distress, &c. Hurst-street and Fazeley-street Missions are fortunate in having each the services of a thoroughly competent and hard-working minister, preaching to large congregations on Sundays, and personally superintending a large number of social, educational, and philanthropic agencies carried on during the week at the Mission buildings, and the Home Mission at the Church of the Messiah has now become, through the very exceptional qualifications for his work of the present missionary, an indispensable addition to the institutions of that church.

This retrospect of religious work connected with our Unitarianism would not be complete without mentioning the Birmingham Postal Mission begun in the same year as the Seed Sower—namely, 1893. Valuable work is done by the ladies of the Committee in a quiet, unobtrusive way, answering the questions of correspondents and circulating tracts and books among those who write for them. Such work, in the words of one of the reports, "has given peaceful and happy moments to those cast down by poverty and sickness, lifted the burden of doubt and despondency, comforted the sorrowful and opened new worlds of thought to seekers after truth."

Now a few words as to the changes in Unitarian thought and theology since the beginning of the century. We hear far less theology now in our pulpits than we used to do, but more religion. Not that we have in any way changed our theological position, but the tendency is to make the most of the religion which is common to all the churches of Christendom. To quote Dr. Crosskey once more:—

> Our churches stand for something much wider than the unity of God as against the trinity. They stand for perfect freedom of thought and expression on the greatest subjects; they stand for the humanitarian aspects of religion against the supernatural; they stand for nobler ethics—for a greater thought of God and a wider hope for men. . . . Religion above theology is now our motto. One sign of this is in the fact that not a single church with a doctrinal trust has been founded by our people in modern times.

I think there is no doubt that our relations towards our orthodox friends are more friendly than formerly, though we are still looked upon by some with a mixture of pity and horror, and instances of petty persecutions at the hands of bigoted Anglicans have not been wanting in quite recent times in country towns in this district. At such times the moral courage of those who hold our views is put to a severe test. In Birmingham itself, we are shut out from co-operation with our orthodox Nonconformist friends in movements connected with their so-called Free Churches, and our young men from becoming members of the Y.M.C.A., merely because we differ in our views of the person of Christ.

The outlook for the future, and our hopes and endeavours for the new century soon to open, must be dealt with in a subsequent letter. H.

SOUTH-PLACE CHAPEL.

Sir,—Allow me to point out a slight error in your "Provincial Letter" of Oct. 6, alluding to the "newly-founded congregations," "before 1850." It states that "the old Presbyterian survivors had been supplemented by Theophilus Lindsey's church in Essex-street, and Vidler's in South-place." Mr. Vidler's chapel was in Parliament-court, Bishopsgate-street. He had no connection with the large chapel in South-place. He died in 1817, and was succeeded by Mr. W. J. Fox, for whom the South-place Chapel was built in 1824.

South-place remained for many years one of the chief Unitarian congregations, until Mr. Fox's advanced views (similar to those held by Theodore Parker) placed him out of touch with the Unitarians of that day. E. F. Bridell-Fox.

Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians.—A well-attended conference of Sunday-school teachers and friends of the churches interested in the religious training of the young was held at Moneyrea on Wednesday week. The chair was taken by the Rev. R. Lyttle, and a paper was read by the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, President of the Association, on "Sunday School Work." The paper dealt with the practical difficulties of teachers, and amongst other things took note of the absence of a regular visitor to the schools of the Association. Mr. Dunbar said scholars in Irish schools were more tractable and better behaved than those of English schools. Fewer persons take part in the work of the Sunday-school of those best able to teach. Parents were first responsible for the religious training of their children. Teaching in the Sunday-school implied great self-sacrifice. It was good to keep up the system of memory work by the committal of hymns and passages of Scripture, and to store the mind with good thoughts to live there in after years; but great care should be exercised in the selection that the passages should be such as to be of after religious value to the scholar. In many districts both scholars and teachers had long distances to travel to the Sunday meeting. The Rev. R. Lyttle referred to the difficulty of getting Irish children to answer questions, and this he attributed largely to the past system of national school education, which crammed the mind. Children were not being taught Unitarian Christianity. The days of theological discussion were not over. The results of textual criticism were not yet understood. Miss Andrews (Comber) urged preparation for the Sunday's work as of prime importance. The Rev. A. Davison also urged preparation, and that no pains should be spared to make our faith known. The Rev. Alexander Ashworth pleaded for the imparting of more definite ideas of the principles of our faith. The Rev. W. G. Marsden spoke of the need of some simple commentary for the assistance of teachers to explain the Bible reading. The Rev. T. Dunkerley, referring to the shyness of scholars answering questions, recommended the principle of questioning illustrated in Plato's Divine Dialogues. Miss Malcolm (Holywood) said she had succeeded to an appreciable extent in drawing answers from scholars by the exhibition of pictures illustrating the subject. The Rev. G. J. Slipper urged we should ground the scholars in religion, and theology might be left to take care of itself. The Rev. H. M'Gowan also spoke, and was followed by Miss Patterson (Holywood) and Miss Sloane (Comber). The conference closed after sitting two and a half hours, and the discussion took a very useful and practical turn. Everyone felt it had been a great privilege to be present, and it was urged by more than one that such meetings of teachers should be oftener held. Mr. John Bennett had generously provided hospitality for the guests, and a warm vote of thanks to him, to the Chairman, and the reader of the paper, followed by the singing of "Come, Kingdom of Our God" and the pronouncing of the benediction by the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, closed the meeting.

Brighton.—On Monday evening, Oct. 8, the first of what promises to be a very successful course of Ambulance lectures, was given by Dr. Benham, a member of the congregation. This class, which is quite a new venture, was arranged by the Rev. H. M. Livens, and has been warmly taken up by the committee and members of the congregation, both old and young.

Chester.—A meeting was held in Matthew Henry's Chapel on Wednesday week to welcome the Rev. H. E. Haycock to the ministry of the chapel, in succession to the Rev. H. D. Roberts. Mr. W. Orrett took the chair, and in the interval of a capital programme of vocal and instrumental music, the Rev. J. K. Montgomery offered a cordial welcome to Mr. Haycock on behalf of the congregation. Unitarians in Chester, he said, were too small a body to accord to him a very ceremonious reception, but they would atone for its simplicity by its heartiness. After an experience of forty years in Chester, he knew that the post to which Mr. Haycock came was not an easy one, but he came to it in the right spirit, and the congregation had never been more harmonious than it was at present, and ready to support their minister. Mr. Arthur Orrett joined in the welcome on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. G. A. Payne, on behalf of the ministers of the district. Mr. Haycock, in reply, said that he did not come as a stranger to Chester, and expressed his willingness to enter into the larger life of the city, and especially in the service of the poor.

Chichester.—The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott has commenced a series of special discourses for the evening services to the end of the year. The subject for October (in three parts) is "Evidences of a veiled Unitarianism in the teachings of the so-called 'Orthodox' Churches."

East London Sunday School Union.—The first of the series of monthly meetings of this Union took place on Saturday evening last at Forest-gate, the President, Mr. Lucking Tavener, in the chair. The various schools in the Union were well represented by about thirty-five teachers. A very interesting paper, entitled "Echoes from the Oxford Summer Session," was read by Miss Rosa Browning, followed by a short discussion, in which Mr. A. Thompson, the Rev. H. W. Perris, and others took part. A very pleasant evening was concluded by the singing of a hymn, followed by prayer by the Chairman. Refreshments were kindly provided in the early part of the evening by the Forest-gate congregation.

Frenchay, near Bristol.—There was an error in our report last week of the farewell presentation to Mr. Lockett. He has hitherto been studying at University College, Bristol, and has now entered on his career as a student for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford.

Gateacre.—The bicentenary of Gateacre Chapel was celebrated on Sunday and Monday last. Of this we hope to have some further report next week.

London: Islington.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in Unity Church on Sunday, Oct. 14. The sermon was preached in the morning by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston and in the evening by the minister, the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, M.A. The offerings of fruit and flowers were afterwards taken to the North London Nursing Home and to Winifred House. An interesting feature of the morning service was the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Percy Preston, who celebrated their silver wedding on Sunday last, they having been married at Unity Church on Oct. 14, 1875. The Rev. F. K. Freeston made an appropriate reference to the event, and Mr. and Mrs. Preston received the sincere congratulations of their many friends.

London: Kilburn.—Successful Harvest Thanksgiving Services at Quex-road last Sunday, were followed on Monday by the first meeting of the new Congregational Society, when there was another large gathering of members and friends. A considerable number of new members have joined the church during the past year; new activities have been arranged, and there is every prospect that the congregation will become self-supporting at no far distant date.

London: Stamford-street.—The anniversary services on Sunday last were conducted by the minister in the morning, whose subject, "Our Cause 1666-1900," was relative to the foundation and history of the congregation; and in the evening Mr. Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, of the Brahmo Somaj, discoursed most eloquently on "Universal Religion" to a large congregation. The first meeting of the Social Institute was held on Monday, when a lecture on "Charles Dickens," with illustrative readings, by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, was listened to with much pleasure; the Rev. Frederic Allen presided, and a hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Daplyn, on the motion of the Rev. Mr. Stallworthy, of Haslemere, and Mr. James Welch.

Middleton.—A meeting was held last Saturday to welcome the Rev. John Harrison to the ministry of the Old-road Unitarian Church. After tea the chair was taken by Ald. T. B. Wood, who was supported by the Revs. J. Harrison, G. Knight, W. Holmshaw, J. A. Pearson, W. Reynolds, W. Westall (Swedenborgian), W. H. Fothergill (Congregationalist), and W. Vause (Methodist Free Church). A cordial welcome was offered to Mr. and Mrs. Harrison on behalf of church and school, in which the Rev. G. Knight, on behalf of the Manchester District Association and the three ministers of other denominations present, joined.

Northampton (Resignation).—With great regret the Rev. John Byles has felt obliged on account of uncertain health to resign the pulpit of Kettering-road Church, and will conclude his ministry at Northampton with the present year. Mr. Byles hopes that after a period of complete rest he may yet be able to render some further ministerial service. The congregation at Kettering-road have received the resignation with much sympathy, and expressions of gratitude for the services Mr. Byles has rendered to the church during the past two years.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—The annual soirée of the High Pavement congregation was held in the Albert Hall on 10th inst., when, after tea, the chair was taken by the senior warden, Mr. J. C. Warren, who was supported by Mr. P. W. Clayden, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. Lindsay, and J. Birks, Letters regretting their inability to attend from the Revs. W. E. Addis, James Harwood, J. K. Smith and others. The Senior Warden, in opening the meeting, offered, on behalf of the congregation, their warmest welcome to the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas and Mrs. Thomas, who had so recently come amongst them. Their ardent hope was that Mr. Thomas had entered on what would be a long ministry. He knew it would be a very able and earnest one. Already the congregations had largely increased, and their services were more hearty than they had been for a long time. The Rev. W. Lindsay, on behalf of Christ Church and the Hyson Green Mission, and the Rev. J. Birks, on behalf of other North Midland churches, joined in the welcome. Mr. Clayden congratulated them upon having brought a long interregnum to a happy end. He had often heard it said that no congregations keep together so well under such circumstances as Unitarian congregations, and congratulated Mr. Thomas on coming to such a congregation and to such a city, and to such an opportunity for usefulness. He could tell Mr. Thomas something about the congregation. It had a great historic past, and he was entering into that historic past. The work that had been done in the town by the congregation had established its reputation and made it a splendid platform for a man who wanted to do some good for humanity and Christianity. If Mr. Thomas could get all those who were present to attend High Pavement Chapel regularly, it would be a grand success, and they themselves would get great benefit from it. That meeting was of the happiest augury for the future. He desired for the congregation spiritual prosperity and success. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong said it was hard lines on him to be asked to welcome Mr. Thomas to the High Pavement, because when he looked on the faces before him, he could not realise that they were not his own congregation. He thought the different characteristics of the various recent ministries at the High Pavement a matter for some interesting reflections to those who had been faithful members throughout them all. For they certainly had not had an absolute unity of teaching, although he thought they had unity of spirit. He believed the underlying feelings which had prompted the teaching had been the same, but the form was singularly diverse. Various aspects of the Christian gospel had been given them, so they ought to have an intelligent conception of the different lines of thought amongst them. What Mr. Thomas's line would be he did not know, but he was sure it would echo his heart's belief. He would not desire them to take his teaching because it was his, but that they might arrive at their own convictions through it. That variety of teaching made a great demand on them, not to accept doctrine as placed before them, but to take all things earnestly into consideration in order to get as near as might be to the truth. He welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Thomas to Nottingham, though he was sorry they were lost to Liverpool. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in responding, said he was extremely thankful to them for the spontaneous way in which their welcome had been expressed. He hoped he would deserve all that had been said. He thanked those who had spoken for their kindly welcome. He knew Mr. Armstrong long before he had dreamed of becoming a minister. He did not know how far he had been influenced by him in becoming a minister. He had heard on all hands, in going about, such kindly tender references to Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Clayden that he could not think of any greater reward than to leave behind him such a memory. A selection of music was performed by the combined choirs of the High Pavement Chapel and Christ Church, and a very happy and successful evening closed at ten o'clock.

Saffron Walden.—The congregation here is passing through an acute crisis. Upwards of one-half of the glebe lands have failed to obtain any tenant at all, and they are in part fallow. They will not let as allotments; they are some of the best lands in the parish, and are close to the town, within half a mile of the market-place. The trustees, with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, offered these said arable lands for sale by auction on 9th inst., with the result—three fields were sold, and for three others not one offer for purchase could be obtained. Since the day of sale one offer to rent part has been made at 10s. per acre, out of which 7s. per acre must be paid annually, because both rectorial and vicarial tithes are upon all the lands. The deficiency of income due to these causes has increased year after year since 1880, and it presses very heavily upon the minister, who in the lack of his due stipend is the chief sufferer. Agricultural depression and want of enterprise are realities in this part of Essex.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held in the Unitarian Chapel, Merthyr Tydfil, on Monday, Oct. 15; the President, Mr. H. W. Thompson, of Cardiff, in the chair. The Executive Committee met at 2.40 in the afternoon and the General Committee at 3.10. The Committee had under discussion the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Pontypridd, as minister of the congregation in that town, and the missionary agent of the society. The Committee were obliged, with great regret, to accept the resignation of the doctor, who has been a faithful and efficient servant of the cause for eight years. The following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That this Society accepts with regret the resignation of Dr. Griffiths, who for nearly eight years has occupied the post of Unitarian missionary in Wales, and desires to express its gratitude for the zeal and faithfulness which have characterised his labours, and also the moral courage which he has always shown in vindicating the Unitarian position even when met by great opposition. It also desires to express its best wishes for his continued usefulness and success in the future." After tea, provided by the local congregation, the Glamorganshire Ministers' Union held its quarterly meeting. It was resolved that we, the ministers of this Union, together with the President and treasurer of the South-East Wales Society, resolve ourselves into a committee to discuss the best means of celebrating the dawn of the new century. The heavy debts under which some of our new churches are labouring are a great stumbling-block, and there is pressing need that a great part, if not all of the burden, should be removed. With a view to initiating some movement to help these churches this Committee will meet at Neath on Tuesday, Oct. 23. The Rev. W. J. Phillips, of Nottage, read a paper on "Some Purposes for which a Church should Stand." The paper was much appreciated, and an interesting discussion followed, in which all the ministers present joined. It was resolved that Mr. Phillips's paper be inserted in the Ymofynydd. At 7.30 a devotional service was held in the chapel. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. J. Tyssul Davies, B.A., preached a most inspiring and soul-stirring sermon on "The Things we lack," taking for his text 1 Thessalonians iii. 10.

Walsall (Resignation).—At the close of service on Sunday night last, the Rev. Peter Dean announced that he had that day concluded twenty-five years of service as minister of that congregation, and it was now his intention to seek another pulpit. During his long term in Walsall, in addition to his ministerial service, Mr. Dean has for twelve years been a member of the Walsall School Board, and acted as chairman of some of its most important committees; he has also been a member of the Hospital Committee, a manager of the Midland Truant School at Lichfield, of the Walsall Municipal Charities, and Technical School; a vice-president of the Local Liberal Association and Temperance Society, and in many other respects has taken a prominent part in public work. Of his "Life of Theodore Parker," written soon after he settled in Walsall, Miss Frances Power Cobbe wrote in her "Autobiography": "Three biographies of Parker have appeared; the shortest, published in England by the Rev. Peter Dean, being in my opinion the best."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

TO-MORROW is Citizen Sunday, which has this year a special significance in view of the approaching election of the new Borough Councils for London. Of this we have written further in our leading article. We are glad to see that the Guardian strongly deprecates the introduction of party politics into the contests, and urges the election of capable and disinterested councillors.

Men of leisure and of culture must not stand aloof; a cold shoulder must be given to those whose candidature is prompted by interested motives, to the owners of insanitary property, and those who are interested in the drink traffic—the "slum lords" and the "rum lords"—to the jerry-builder and the contractor; and, lastly, it is desirable that the contests should not be run on party lines. There is not, in the nature of things, any reason that municipal questions should be decided on the lines of Imperial politics, that a follower of Lord Salisbury should pose as a Moderate, or a disciple of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman as a Progressive; but in practice, no doubt, it is extremely difficult for a candidate to establish his position independently of one or other of the local political associations. But it can be done by men who have earned the confidence of their neighbours, and these are the men we want. And besides independent candidates we want independent voters, who will ignore the crack of the party whip and will simply choose the candidate whose character stands highest, whose aims are most unselfish, and whose judgments on social questions have been formed by actual experience. We are not so sanguine as to suppose that, at the best, there can be any sudden or startling transformation of the conditions of London life; at the best it must be infinitely slow, uphill work, line upon line, here a little and there a little; but, none the less, there is an enormous difference between returning the best men available and the worst men who present themselves as candidates. London has in many ways lagged behind some great provincial cities in her local government; she need do so no longer.

THE second of Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was given at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, and there was again a very good attendance. The chair was taken by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Brixton. The subject was "Changed Views of Prophecy," showing how the old notion that the Prophets of Israel miraculously foretold the character and coming of Christ some centuries before his actual appearance has given place to a more reasonable and historical conception of their work as the religious teachers and inspirers of their people. The subject of next Tuesday's lecture is "The Gospel and the Origin of Christianity," leading up to a more detailed treatment in subsequent lectures of the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. The lectures, as we stated last week, are freely open to the public by tickets, which may be had at Essex Hall.

ON Thursday afternoon Lady O'Hagan opened a Sale of Work at Essex Hall for the disposal of goods remaining from the London Unitarian Bazaar. The chair was taken by Dr. Blake Odgers, who, in opening the proceedings, offered a very cordial welcome home to Lady O'Hagan on her return from South Africa, where she had been devoting herself to the care of the wounded in the war, having been placed by Lord Roberts in charge of the hospital of Nauwpoort, on the borders of the Free State. Lady O'Hagan, in acknowledging the welcome and the expressions of sympathy with her in her work, said that she had had many painful and heart-rending experiences, but had been sustained by the thought that she was in the mind and heart of true friends at home. The small hospital, of which she had been in charge was, when she first went there, at the front. Perched on a hill 5,000 ft. above the sea, Nauwpoort was practically only a junction on the railway, but for that reason a place of great importance to be held; and there she had full opportunities of seeing the convoys of sick and wounded as they were brought back. As to the right or wrong of the war, or whether it could have been avoided, she would not express an opinion, but if before she had a horror of war, she now felt it more strongly and deeply than ever, having seen the terrible realities of what fighting meant, and she wished, when people talked enthusiastically and glibly of setting nation against nation and entering into war, that she could take them to see what she had seen. She had seen the troops going out and returning from the front, and could not speak too highly of the spirit which animated them, never an expression of discouragement or cowardice, even from those who suffered most. Having seen the fine material sent out to engage in that conflict, she could not but feel painfully to what nobler uses it could have been put at home. But now they should not waste time in speculation as to what might have been, but consider the lessons to be drawn from what had taken place; and she wished to urge her friends now to make their influence felt, the influence of intellect and character, to put themselves in the front, in all civil matters, in the government of the country, in much needed reforms. Men of character, of education, and intellect were needed, if they were to reap the fruits of victory, and be safeguarded from the intoxication of success, if it might be counted success, and in any case to give themselves to serve the true interests of their country. It was a great pleasure to her to be there and to declare the sale open.

REPLYING to a vote of thanks moved by the Rev. A. Farquharson, and seconded by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, Lady O'Hagan mentioned that she had just been greeted by a letter of thanks from the mother of one of the young soldiers dangerously wounded, whom she had nursed, and who had been able to return home. The mother did not know her English address, but seeing her name announced in connection with that meeting at Essex Hall, had addressed her letter there. Lady O'Hagan then added a very earnest plea to her hearers, begging them to carry it still further, that when their soldiers returned home they should be received with a very warm welcome, indeed, but with a judicious and sensible welcome, so that the habits of sobriety and self-restraint, which they had of necessity formed in the war, might not be broken down and destroyed by the injudicious kindness of friends.

AT the meeting of the Congregational Union last week at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. Carvell Williams, as President, gave a very vigorous address on the present duties of Free Churches. Referring to the sharp differences of opinion as to the war in South Africa, he yet affirmed that all must be shocked at the callousness and levity which had made the war in many places an occasion for amusement and revelry, and added that it must be a matter for serious concern that a new generation had been infected by the warlike spirit, which threatened to inflict on our country the curse of militarism, which had fallen on some other nations. Dealing with the question of Disestablishment, he said there was now "an Episcopalian revolt against the state of religious serfdom," which was a hopeful sign.

But those who utter assertions of the spiritual nature of the Church, and demands for its freedom from State control, are, with some exceptions, unprepared to adopt the only practical mode of giving them effect. They want all the blessings of freedom and independence, and yet at the same time to enjoy all the advantages, or supposed advantages, of Establishment. Hence we have impracticable schemes of Church reform, which would take from the State its present power of control, while the national endowments would remain in possession of the Church, as well as the exclusive privileges now conferred upon it by the State. Not until the British Parliament has sunk into imbecility will it be likely to yield to so preposterous a demand.

Speaking of intemperance, Mr. Carvell Williams pointed to the enormous influences of the trade over Parliament and the policy of Cabinets, and asked to what forces of resistance they must look for success in that great struggle?

We need, in the first place, the same passionate earnestness on the part of all our Churches and of all our philanthropists as mainly destroyed, first the slave trade, and then negro slavery. Yes! and we need practical wisdom as well as enthusiasm, that we may unite in seeking for what is obtainable; instead of merely advocating abstract principles and refusing to accept anything but absolutely perfect measures. They must make the lot of the masses more endurable, by better housing, and more enjoyable, by out-distancing the pot-house and the gin-palace in providing the means of brightening their lives.

As to the Christian Endeavour movement he thought it too early to pronounce a definite opinion as to its permanence or results, but no one at the recent meetings at the Alexandra Palace could help being thrilled by the thought of those thousands of young souls gathered from many parts of the world for a purely religious purpose and consecrated to the service of Christ and the good of their fellow-men. It was admitted that there were dangers in the movement, that it might beget an appetite for sensationalism and excitement to the disparagement of steady, sober work, and might foster youthful pride and obtrusiveness; but if the movement did not prove ephemeral, it would be the duty of the churches to help and guide these new and ardent recruits in the army of the Lord.

At a subsequent evening public meeting for "the Exposition and Enforcement of Free Church Principles," Dr. Horton made eloquent reference to St. Francis of Assisi's ideal of life, and the Rev. Bernard J. Snell (who began his ministry at Newcastle) also made a striking speech. One of the greatest heresies in Independency, he said, was that of not thinking. The remedy for wrong thinking was better thinking. Thinking all alike was usually regarded as a mark of intellectual weakness. They must be prepared to allow to others the same liberty they claimed for themselves. Referring to the poverty of many ministers which made it a mockery to tell them to study and equip themselves, he said: "No man can do his best for the Lord when he is holding the wolf by both ears." A great need was of systematic co-operation between the richer and poorer churches, and that could be done without laying hands on the sacred ark of Independency. He did not think he should be suspected of Presbyterianism, and he did not suggest the imposition of a creed. They had never had a creed, and never would have one. They should simply ask, "Is the man a true and faithful servant of Jesus Christ," and trust one another.

The Christian Life printed last week a passage from a letter of Mr. G. L. Bruce's referring to the work of the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on the London School Board and the loss involved in his approaching retirement. Mr. Bruce, who was himself formerly a member of the Board, and is particularly well acquainted with the work of the schools at the East-end, wrote:—

"What difference will Bowie's retirement make?" an immense difference. There is the loss of a hard worker and a good speaker. For the last three years Mr. Bowie, as Chairman of the School Attendance Committee, has held the most contentious post on the Board, and has held it admirably. You know all that. What no outsider knows is how much his party and the Board owe to his enthusiasm, his common sense, his simplicity, his unselfishness. Many men are liked. Some are respected. Every one both liked and respected Bowie. Never was a sounder Progressive, but never a more independent or less faddy member of a party. Many is the difficulty that his obvious good sense, his never-failing good humour, and his absolute straightforwardness have cleared away. No petty jealousy, no back-biting, nothing mean ever marked him or was tolerated by him. He was a frank friend and a frank foe. There was a sweet reasonableness to his rugged honesty that brought with it unity and good feeling.

The death of the Rev. Charles Garrett at Liverpool last Sunday, in his seventy-fifth year, removes from the field of his many labours one of the best loved and most faithful of Christian ministers. A Dorset man, of humble origin, Mr. Garrett became known as one of the earliest and most successful advocates of total abstinence, and as a devoted Wesleyan minister. At the time of the Lancashire cotton famine he was stationed at Preston, and both there and afterwards in Manchester, he exercised a ministry of great helpfulness in which his strong and compassionate nature made itself both deeply and widely felt. But his chief work was done in Liverpool, where for many years he was head of the Wesleyan Mission, and was the promoter of much beneficent social work. The friend of Bishop Fraser, of Manchester, and of the late Bishop of Liverpool, Mr. Garrett worked with frank and cordial sympathy with all who had the good of their fellow-men at heart. He was from the first a warm supporter of the Liverpool Conference of Ministers of Religion on Social Questions, in which Roman Catholics and Anglican clergy were united with Unitarians, Congregationalists, and other Nonconformist ministers in friendly co-operation. In 1882 Mr. Garrett was elected to the Presidency of the Wesleyan Conference. Of him, as of Mgr. Nugent, it may be truly said, that he was beloved of all the Churches, and of many beyond the borders of any Church.

An interesting lecture is to be given by Mr. Lucking Tavener next Thursday at College Chapel, Stepney, as will be seen from the advertisement, on "Florence, the Cradle of Art." During his recent visit to Italy Mr. Tavener took over 200 photographs, and his lecture will be enriched by lime-light illustrations. Miss Florence Hill writes to say that College Chapel is quite accessible from Aldgate and Whitechapel Stations, and trams and omnibuses running thence up Mile End-road will put passengers down at the corner of Stepney-green.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

IV.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (II.)

In the same year in which the Evangelical section won its greatest triumph there was born, in the rival ranks of the High Churchmen, a new party, which speedily supplanted the party of Venn and Wilberforce as the most prominent force in the Church of England. For many years it remained, like its predecessor, comparatively small in numbers; but its relation to the Church, as a whole, was even then very different from that of the "Clapham sect." The Oxford movement exercised from the first a formative power upon the Anglican communion. It has exhibited not only a more vigorous vitality, but also a far greater faculty of influence than any other movement since the sixteenth-century Reformation. While the militant centre of the party to which it gave birth has often seemed, down to our own day, to be the mark for general detestation and persecution, even those who clamoured loudest were themselves witnesses—in the fashion and tone of their services, in the very catchwords which they used against the Ritualists—of the diffusive force of the Tractarian principles. At the end of the century we see these principles in possession of the field. A black gown is almost as rare as a black swan. The words "Catholic" and "Protestant" may almost be said to have changed places, during the last seventy years, in clerical conversation.

The Catholic revival was the work, in one sense, of Oriel common-room. There can be no doubt that the influence of the Noëtics, and especially of Thomas Arnold, with his grand doctrine that character is the right expression of faith, was strong upon the young men who followed them at their own high table. John Keble, J. H. Newman, R. H. Froude, E. B. Pusey, were all Fellows of Oriel. But individual men, however saintly and able, and learned societies, however distinguished, are not enough to account for the sudden success, quite beyond all expectation, with which their first public efforts were greeted. There must have been a store of prepared material, a magazine awaiting the match, before the sermons and tracts of 1833-1840 could work such mighty results.

The Tractarian movement was in fact the appearance above the soil of a plant which had long been growing at the root. In the year 1800 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (a distinctly High Church Society) had a total income of £4,983 2s. 8d., of which only £457 16s. came from subscriptions. There were 197 subscribers. In 1832 the income had increased seventeen-fold, and there were thirty-seven times as many subscribers as in 1800. In 1827 Keble's Christian Year was published. The favour with which it was received cannot be ascribed, in any great part, to sympathy with the author's theological opinions; but it may at least be held to signify that there was no wide and deep dislike of those opinions, which are clearly to be descried in his poetry. There can be no doubt that the spirit of this work, coming in no "questionable form" of logical polemic, but "on the viewless wings of poesy," did much to prepare the minds of men for Newman's intellectual challenge.

The moment, moreover, of its inauguration was most favourable to the growth of such a movement. The majority of Churchmen still belonged to that no-colour, rest-and-rust, conservative party which had been in possession when the century began. Its one positive tenet as a party had been the maintenance of Church and State. Suddenly it found itself confronted by a crisis in which a choice must be made between the two. "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak, or die!" The clergy as a body had opposed the Reform Bill, and the Reform Bill had become law. Little wonder that the Church should look upon the reformed Parliament, the new State, with suspicion and misgiving. Threats against the Establishment were heard everywhere. I have quoted a speech of Joseph Hume in the House of Commons; in the House of Lords the Prime Minister himself had bidden the bishops to "set their house in order." Now, in 1833, it seemed that the threat implied in those words was about to be executed. A beginning was to be made in Ireland, and a Bill for the suppression of ten Irish bishoprics was introduced into Parliament. This may not appear to us, in the light of later events, so momentous or dangerous a proposal as it then appeared to English Churchmen. We must remember that it was the first great interference of the State in ecclesiastical arrangements since the suspension of Convocation in 1717: the first attempt to treat a national Church as a mere branch of the civil service.

The rank and file of the clergy were filled with panic, and looked eagerly for a saviour. The Evangelical party had no help to offer: its concern lay with the individual soul. Upon a great moral question it could act unitedly and forcibly, but not on a question of ecclesiastical politics. Arnold's scheme for preserving the Church by making it really national, by weeding its formularies so that all Christians (except, of course, Roman Catholics and Unitarians) might be included within it, was as a Scylla to the Charybdis of disestablishment. In the nick of time the voice of John Keble was heard from the pulpit of St. Mary's, sounding a trumpet note on national apostacy. "The Church is a divine society; let no merely human hand profane her": here was the watchword for which Churchmen were waiting. It was from Keble's assize-sermon, on June 14, 1833, that Newman used to date the rise of the Oxford movement.

There was thus, from the very first, an element of selfish conservatism in the movement. The horde of clerics who had something to lose by disestablishment came to its aid. There was also to be heard from the first that note of arrogance, of priestly privilege and ostentation, which is a loud voice among the Anglo-Catholics to-day. But there were elements of a very different kind—noble elements, which were at least equally operative in advancing the Tractarian cause.

One of these lay in the personal character of the leaders. Newman, who was the brain and conscience of the work, was a man whose standard of life was as high as Arnold's own, whose speech, demeanour, written style were full of sweetness and dignity, whose subtle intellect was obedient to a conscience of ever greater subtlety. Keble was the poet of the Christian Year, delicate, spiritual, tender; cultured in scholarship, loyal and staunch—the ideal of a Christian gentleman. Pusey was "the most venerated man in Oxford"; unequalled in theological learning, ascetic in life, grave and uplifting in society. These were the chief men, and by their character that of their associates may be gauged.

Another of the better elements of strength in the movement was a reaction against the impassiveness which had become associated with churchmanship. The zeal of the Evangelicals, stigmatised as Methodism, had at length succeeded in setting free the slaves. The zeal of the liberals had been poured out, as by Arnold at Rugby, in the culture of a specially English type of religious manliness. Such men as Stanley, Jowett, Clough, Pattison, with many who became leading Tractarians, were the fruits which they had to show. A worthy shame was making itself felt among the High Churchmen and the Church-and-State men that they had no such works to exhibit; with no enthusiasm of their own, they were sick of deriding the enthusiasm of better men. The Tracts set before them just what they needed. Here was an object which must appeal to the most insensate: a divine society, the Bride of Christ, ancient and venerable, yet young with everlasting youth, decked with celestial graces, able to confer unearthly powers—here was the Church, humiliated and defiled; with the purple robe cast about her, as about her Master, in derision; bound in human fetters, and about to be given up to the multitude. The enthusiasm for such a society was by so much nobler than the Evangelical's anxiety to save his own soul as love of others is nobler than love of self. The better zeal of the Evangelicals, their anxiety to save others' souls, was here, too, in full measure, and the moral value of Arnold's teaching seemed also to have been adopted by the Tractarians, in their insistance that loyal churchmanship involved saintliness of life.

What was afterwards called Ritualism was not conspicuous in the early Oxford movement, but the tendency to greater solemnity of ceremonial was there from the beginning. It helped the movement not only by captivating those whose powers of worship are to be stimulated rather through the senses than the reflective faculties, but also in so far as it coincided with an intelligent reaction against the dryness of eighteenth-century worship.

Yet, again, the movement was helped by the panic into which many religious minds had been thrown by the yet rudimentary German criticism of the Gospels. It seemed to them that if reason alone, or reason and the Bible, were to be trusted, the result must needs be "sheer atheism." Pure spiritual worship without the element of the miraculous was hardly conceived as a possibility—so grievously had the argument for miracles been overworked. There was a yearning in those minds for some infallible authority, on which, as on an impregnable fortress, the assaults of reason should shatter themselves in vain. Such an authority the Tractarians held forth in their visible Catholic Church.

The Tracts began to be issued in 1833. They were nearly all written by Oriel men. At first they were short leaflets dealing each with some one sacramental doctrine or practice of the Church. In 1834 Dr. Pusey ranged himself openly with Newman and his friends. Next year the Tractarian protest against Dr. Hampden's appointment as Regius Professor of Divinity still further strengthened the party. In 1836 Newman published the tracts which deal with the Roman controversy. The problem before him was to overrule the apparently better claim of the Roman Church to be the true Catholic Church in this country. His conception of "the Church" excluded the idea of more than one Church. Did he deny the claims of Rome to be "the Church"? If not, how could the Church of England be "the Church" also? His reply was the famous theory of the Via Media. The Church in actual life, he contends, is a divine idea marred by human sin. It has lost its external unity, though there is an inner unity between its severed parts. That part which we call the Church of England, and that which we call the Church of Rome, are both corrupt. The special position of the English Church gives her reason to hope that by diligent self-cleansing she may in the end be the means of reuniting distracted Christendom. It is the duty of her sons to work for this end; to endure what must be endured, but ever strive to remove abuses, until their mother is purified of her Protestantism, and ready to join hands with her other self beyond the sea.

In 1837 the "Remains" of R. H. Froude appeared, edited by Newman and Keble. This book made plain to all that the process of cleansing to which these men would subject the Church must not stop short in the sixteenth century; it must go back beyond the Reformation of Henry VIII. The fear of Popery, which had already begun to overshadow the movement, now grew much more definite and articulate. In 1840 came out Tract XC., in which Newman argues that the Articles can be signed in a sense which does not exclude any doctrine of the Roman Church. The storm broke, a violent anti-Tractarian movement began under the No-Popery banner. It became known that the Oxford leaders were divided among themselves. Some of them, W. G. Ward conspicuously, with Faber, Oakeley, Dalgairns, and others, were openly Romanising. Pusey and Keble remained sturdily Anglican. Newman, smitten with grievous doubt, withdrew to Littlemore. In 1843 Pusey was suspended for a sermon on the Eucharist. In 1844 Ward was deprived of his degrees by Convocation, for the views expressed in his "Ideal of a Christian Church," and Newman himself only escaped condemnation for Tract XC. through the interposition of the Proctors' veto. At length, in October, 1845, Newman passed out of his long struggle and hesitation into the bosom of the Roman Church.

Some argue that if he had but waited he would have found the Via Media a reality, instead of a dream, and so might have remained among the Anglicans. Is it so? That there are many Romanisers in English benefices few will deny, but it is not by such evidence, nor by the wholesale adoption of Roman ritual, that Newman's course could have been determined. If the Anglican Church was Protestant in 1845, she is Protestant still. No letter of her articles or formularies has been altered. If the prospect of reunion with Rome was desperate in 1845, what is it after the Vatican Council and the Bull on English orders?

The remaining half of the century has witnessed the steady growth, through much persecution, and final predominance of the Anglo-Catholic party. The issue of the Gorham case in 1850, which left a clergyman free to deny the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, induced Archdeacon Manning and others to follow Newman. In 1856 Archdeacon Denison, and in 1871 Mr. Bennett, vicar of Frome, were proceeded against on points of doctrine, but the prosecutors were unsuccessful. During the next twenty years prosecutions on points of ritual were not uncommon, and several clergymen suffered imprisonment in consequence. The last prosecution, that of the Bishop of Lincoln in 1892, resulted in a virtual victory for the Anglo-Catholic party. Since then the Church Association, which was the chief agent in these prosecutions, has abandoned its not very admirable policy. The English Church Union, which was brought into existence to strengthen the Neo-Catholics in their time of stress, is now the most powerful society in the whole Anglican communion.

UPPER CHAPEL, SHEFFIELD.

BICENTENARY.

The special meetings in celebration of the Bicentenary of Upper Chapel were held on Thursday, Oct. 18, following the autumn meeting of the B. and F. U. A., reported last week. A special service of commemoration was held in the morning, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, on "The Old and the New," which we shall publish in full next week.

After lunch a bicentenary conference was held in the chapel, at which Mr. A. J. Hobson presided, in the absence of Mr. M. J. Hunter, chairman of the chapel trustees, who unfortunately was not well enough to be present. His mother, Mrs. Hunter, widow of the late chairman, was, however, present to take part in the proceedings.

The meeting opened with the singing of Emerson's hymn, "We love the venerable house our fathers built to God," after which the Chairman mentioned the receipt of letters of regret at inability to attend from the Rev. Charles Peach, Mr. R. E. Leader, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, and the Rev. W. Blazeby; and he also read a letter of greeting from the new church at Gateshead. He then invited the attention of the visitors to the Fisher Institution, one of the institutions in connection with Upper Chapel, in which he had a personal interest, and in urging an appeal for support for that charitable organisation he explained how its origin on denominational lines (it is for the benefit of Unitarians and Roman Catholics only), was due to the prior existence of the Deakin Institution for the exclusive benefit of members of the Church of England, and Protestant Dissenters who are Trinitarians. Proceeding to the special ceremony of the day, he invited Mrs. Hunter to unveil a tablet which has been erected in the chapel in connection with the bicentenary celebration to the memory of the first minister of the chapel, the Rev. Timothy Jollie. This, however, was not the only memento of the 200th anniversary; the occasion had also been made use of to secure funds for the renewal of the organ, the re-building of the vestry, and the preparation and publication of the history of the chapel, which Mr. Manning had written.

Mrs. Hunter then unveiled the tablet, which is of Sicilian marble, and is erected in the vacant niche over the choir stalls. The inscription is a copy of the Latin inscription on the tombstone of the Rev. Timothy Jollie in the chapel yard, which is now almost obliterated. After the Latin comes the following translation, which Mr. Manning subsequently read to the meeting:—

Sacred to Christ the Saviour. Timothy Jollie, an eloquent and evangelical interpreter of the word of God; a man almost divine, and truly great in laying the foundations of Christian doctrine. He taught philosophy and sacred theology, being a successful and skilful instructor of youth. He was the watchful and faithful pastor of the Church of Christ in Sheffield for 33 years. He departed this life March 28, A.D. 1714, in the 56th year of his age. To live is Christ, to die is gain.

A panel at the base of the tablet is of Sienna marble, and bears the inscription:—

The above is a reproduction of a time-worn inscription on the tomb of the Rev. Timothy Jollie, during whose ministry this place of worship was built; and this tablet is erected by the congregation of Upper Chapel, A.D. 1900, the bicentennial of the building, a memorial of his character and work. He was a faithful minister of the Gospel, and he trained others for the same sacred office.

Mr. Edward Bramley, M.A., in the absence of Mr. M. J. Hunter, said he had been asked by Mrs. Hunter to say a few words for her. Having referred to the inscription on the tablet, he said the building, which was put up 200 years ago, was somewhat different no doubt from the present one, but the walls were the same, without the portico. Interiorly it was probably very bare, with whitewashed walls. To-day they had passed beyond the time when it was considered that the House of God might be one of the plainest, if not even one of the ugliest, buildings in the neighbourhood, and he thought most people would agree that that was an advantage. What the congregation of those days was like it was difficult to picture; no doubt the people were more serious in mien, more sober in habit, than the congregation of to-day, but he did not think they were more serious and sober inwardly. The congregation of Upper Chapel had had the advantage of an open Theistic trust ever since the building was erected, and that congregation had been able to go on in religious progress and freedom by means of it. He hoped they would continue their traditions, and that they would do, like many of their forerunners, their very best to promote the well-being and the happiness of the inhabitants of that district.

The Rev. J. E. Manning then delivered an address on "Timothy Jollie," first reading the following letter from Dr. Brooke Herford:—

Hampstead, Oct. 16, 1900.

My Dear Friends,—Nothing has brought home to me the fact that I am an old man more than my inability to be among my old Sheffield friends at their Bi-Centenary. I can no longer take my place in the marching and fighting line, though I can still stand in my own lot and give a hearty "God Speed" to those who are going forward.

So far I am glad to greet those who are carrying on into the future the traditions and the work which 200 years ago Timothy Jollie and his people finally settled in what, a little later, was called Upper Chapel.

Sheffield has always had a strong place in my heart, and I always loved to feel that the best heart and head of Sheffield were in the Upper Chapel.

I came there as a young man of twenty-six, and found myself at once among surroundings which were in themselves an education. Gracious representatives were there of the old families who had for a number of generations been its upholders. Strong business men, who had built up the later Sheffield; and the pick of the artisans, whose sturdy Yorkshire grit taught me to put strength into my strokes for that simple and practical religion which had come down to us as a tradition. Such a training it was, in manhood and free speech, and the faith which "maketh not ashamed." There had been some controversy at my coming, and certainly some of the best men of the congregation had favoured another man, but from the beginning I had the same warm greeting from all, and those who had been my opponents were among my warmest friends.

And what shall I say of the band of workers in those days, who helped me to make the Upper Chapel the friend and foster brother of all our smaller churches round Stannington and Rotherham and the little congregations of the Peak—and who founded with me a second congregation here in Sheffield—Robert Marsden, and Stephen Bacon, and especially Charles Woollen, "and other my fellow-labourers whose names are in the Book of Life." All are gone now, but their spirit has helped me through the labours of many years, and their names are in many hearts besides my own to-day.

But it would need a volume, not a letter, if I should try to gather up all the memories which rise up as I think of your meeting to-morrow. The volume, indeed, is not lacking, thanks to Mr. Manning, who has written it with a longer knowledge, but hardly with more grateful memory for the past, or deeper wishes for the future.

Your once Minister, and always Friend,

BROOKE HERFORD.

Having also read his translation of the inscription on Jollie's tomb, Mr. Manning said that was the simple memorial of a worthy man. Unfortunately very little of his own writing remained; one or two sermons only, but they had the record of students of Jollie's who all spoke of him in the very highest terms, bearing testimony to the personality of a remarkable man. There was some slight ground for the belief that Jollie was like many remarkable men, of Huguenot descent. He came to Sheffield in 1679, when twenty-three years of age, and after some time spent in ministerial work among the Nonconformists of Sheffield, was ordained as their regular minister, on Independent lines. His congregation included Presbyterians, Baptists, Independents, and other kinds of Dissenters; in fact all the Nonconformists of Sheffield assembled under him. Jollie built up out of these diverse elements a flourishing and powerful congregation. At first they met in Snig-hill on the site where afterwards Hollis's Hospital was built. Every now and then their minister was hauled away to prison, but that only increased their regard for him. The congregation so grew that a new building became necessary, and Upper Chapel was founded. Still the congregation increased, until the church was crowded Sunday by Sunday; and it remained in a very flourshing condition until Jollie's death. A good deal of Jollie's success Mr. Manning attributed to his wife. Mrs. Jollie was a most sensible and charming woman, and she had left behind her a diary that had come down to her descendants, and which he had had the great privilege of reading. It was now in the possession of Mr. Barton Wells, a lineal descendant of the Jollies, whom they had great pleasure to welcome among them. After Mr. Jollie's death there was unfortunately a secession from the Upper Chapel congregation, resulting in the building of Nether Chapel. Mr. Manning concluded with some remarks on the good that had come from the persecuting laws under which Jollie so greatly suffered. The Act of Uniformity and the accompanying penal laws were usually spoken of a deplorable thing; and so they were in a certain way; they showed the wrong temper of the times; they attempted to make all people think and believe alike, a thing which was absolutely impossible. What these laws did effect, however, was this, that they established the Nonconformist churches of England with a noble ancestry, and with a splendid ministry of educated men; and that showed that there was no bad thing in this world which did not ultimately result in some good.

The Rev. WALTER LLOYD, of Gloucester, read a paper on "The Value of the Open Trust." He said the question as to whether the trust deeds of chapels should bind down those who used them to the acceptance of particular creeds and forms of worship had recently come to the front again, and it was interesting to recall the practice in the Nonconformist chapel building period 1690 to 1715. Practically all the meeting houses of that period were founded upon open trusts, and that was so as a general custom whatever the denomination or theology of the people using the chapels might be. The question arose whether the open form of trust deed was adopted by intention or accident. This question was difficult to decide, but there could be no doubt that the value of the open trust had been realised in the nineteenth century. For his own part, he liked to be able to think that the founders of these chapels were as liberal and as far-sighted as they were sometimes said to have been. At a subsequent period, when doctrinal differences among the dissenters began to manifest themselves, the representatives of different schools of thought when they erected new chapels for themselves strictly defined their own theology, and bound down their successors in the use of the building to the acceptance of the same, with the result that in numerous instances to-day Congregationalists were in possession of chapels held on strictly Calvinistic trusts. Mr. Lloyd mentioned one instance where he had tried in vain to be allowed to see the admittedly Calvinistic trust deed of a Congregational chapel. All this showed what evil results followed from these binding doctrinal trusts. Such trusts attempted to impose the opinions of the present upon future generations, a thing essentially futile and wrong. In recent years some new Congregational chapels had been founded upon open trusts, but generally even in the Congregational body that was not the case. The Unitarians were sometimes reproached with teaching doctrine quite different from that of the founders of the chapels they occupied; but there was seen to be no force in such a reproach when it was remembered that the chapels were held on open trusts, and that though their present holders were Unitarian they in no way attempted to bind their successors to continue in that faith. Of course, they hoped their successors would remain Unitarian, but they did not say they must. However, it was the fact that the Unitarian body was the only one which had declared itself to be absolutely in favour of the open trust. They valued the principle because it made the right of private judgment a reality as it could be made in no other way, and it cast off the depressing weight of the dead hand.

The Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON, M.A., of Manchester, followed with a racy address, full of interesting historical matter humorously put together, on "Timothy Jollie as Principal of the Attercliffe Academy." Jollie, besides being minister of Upper Chapel, conducted for 23 years, 1691-1714, an "academy" at Attercliffe—not, as Mr. Gordon put it, a ladies school—but a place for the cultivation of University learning among those intending to enter the ministry of the church. No finer set of men could be found in the eighteenth century than the men whom Jollie produced at his academy at Attercliffe. In all probability there were over a hundred ministers of the Gospel trained by Jollie at the Attercliffe academy, and of these the names of fifty-four had already been recovered—a successful piece of antiquarian research the credit for which was largely to be attributed to the Rev. Giles Hestor.

Mr. BARTON WELLS, a descendant to Timothy Jollie's, then added a few words, saying that it was a great pleasure to him to be present, and to have been able to present a portrait of his ancestor to the Chapel.

The Rev. IDEN PAYNE and Mr. A. J. MORTON having spoken,

The Rev. V. W. PEARSON, B.A., of Wesley College, spoke, as a member of another denomination. He was heartily received. He said he had never been in a Unitarian chapel before, but he had pleasure in being present on such an historic occasion. One of his earliest recollections was of a visit of the Rev. Brooke Herford to the Sunday-school he attended in Manchester; and he had always realised how greatly other churches had been indebted to Unitarian writers and thinkers. Might he give them a suggestion from one of their own writers? He had gathered from what he had heard that day that they were anxious about attendance at public worship as all churches were. He thought one of the best sermons to be found on that subject was Dr. Martineau's "Tides of the Spirit," upon the text, "And Jesus, as his manner was, went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day." If He whom Unitarians and Wesleyans honoured alike, although their theories about Him might not be the same, heeded and took advantage of such help as could be gained in public worship, in these days let His followers imitate His example.

Mr. Pearson was followed by the Rev. T. W. Scott, Mr. J. B. Wostinholm, and the Rev. E. S. Anthony, a descendant of Thomas Hollis, one of the founders of the congregation. The meeting closed with the hymn, "Forward be our watchword," and the Benediction.

For the above report we are indebted to the Sheffield Independent.

In the evening a very successful soirée was held in Channing Hall, in the course of which, on the motion of Sir John Brunner, seconded by the Rev. J. Harwood, a cordial vote of thanks on behalf of the visitors was passed, and Mr. A. J. Hobson responded.

PENDLEBURY CHAPEL.

Sir,—I cannot allow the Rev. Charles Roper's description of the Chapel at Pendlebury to pass without comment from me. The chapel was maintained by my father, Mr. J. Aspinall Turner, for a considerable number of years, not mainly for the use of his own family, but in order to prevent the Swinton congregation from utter extinction.

They were not able even to keep going their small original chapel, since passed into the hands of Roman Catholics, and their remaining members were welcomed by my father and his family, and worshipped with us for years; for part of the time under the Rev. Mr. Minniss, and for another period the services were supplied by various ministers, some of whom still survive in distinguished positions.

When the time became favourable for the resuscitation of the Swinton congregation, and the building of a new chapel at Swinton village, a very prominent part in the provision of the ways and means was taken by our family of that time, and I am almost the sole survivor.

THE FISHER INSTITUTION.—AN APPEAL.

Sir,—This most useful and benevolent institution has just elected ten annuitants and pensioners. The candidates for election came from all parts of the kingdom—London, Bath, Southsea, Manchester, Bradford, Newcastle, Isle of Man, Leamington, Sheffield, Derby, Whitchurch, Hinckley, Maidenhead, Sunderland, Glasgow, Warwick, Bristol, Market Rasen, Scarborough, Liverpool, Southport, Norwich, Evesham, Burnley, and Ireland. Fifty-six candidates, all most deserving, and yet only ten to elect; forty-six disappointed.

My object in writing this letter is to call attention to the fact that, although the recipients of the charity are resident in all parts of the kingdom, the whole of the funds (save from two or three individuals) are from Sheffield. Surely this is an oversight on the part of our benevolent and charitable Unitarian friends. I earnestly appeal to them to help these charities. I shall be glad to reply to any inquiries, or our secretary, Mr. W. R. Stevenson, 10, Norfolk-row, Sheffield, will give all information.

The charities give not less than £15 per annum to reduced educated ladies, and not less than £10 per annum to old and faithful domestics.

OBITUARY.

MRS. PHIPSON.

A tender chord was touched in many hearts when the news came that Mrs. Phipson had passed into her rest. She died on Oct. 6, aged nearly eighty-five, full of years and honour. To some of us she was "The Stuttgart Mother," and it was a name that fitted her well, so wide were her sympathies and so motherly her influence.

She lived for some years in Stuttgart with her daughter, and gathered English girls round her to share her home and receive a German education. As one of those who look back happily to the time spent with her, I feel impelled to write a few words in tribute to her memory. She made us work. She made us play. Her sense of duty was strict; her love of fun was keen; they were two dominant notes in her character.

Two pictures of her rise before me. One, her look as she read prayers night and morning, suffering all the while from intense pain in her eyes, yet determined to lead the household worship herself in spite of it. The other, her bright look of pleasure and her ready laugh over our quips and cranks and little jokes. She loved her girls and studied their characters and had always a pet name and often a word of wise counsel, too, for each. And her love for her "girls" and interest in them followed them through life; every event which touched them touched her. She suffered much in health during the latter part of her life, but her wide sympathies were never crushed and there are many who feel a keen sense of personal loss now that her gentle, loving spirit has passed beyond the veil.

V. S.

MISS ALICE STAPLES.

A life of rare devotion to her religious convictions, and of persuasive influence on others who sought her guidance, has been closed. In view of her love of our religious principles, and of her constant and wise labour for their extension, her course has indeed seemed all too brief.

But those who knew her, and felt the sure influence of her earnest spirit, are thankful for the testimony she bore and the work she accomplished, although for her the sun has gone down while it was yet day. Nurtured in a home where integrity was the characteristic of the daily round, and she herself possessed of a spirit full of out-reaching sympathy with all that was sincere and simple, her mind was given, even in her early years, to the claims of others, and to serious thoughts of sacred things.

It was with the most unreserved pleasure that she gave herself, long years ago, to the work of the Lewins Mead Sunday-school, and those in whose hearts she surely dropped the seeds of faith, and whom she drew so closely to herself in the bonds of strong personal affection, are amongst those who most keenly feel the departure of a friend so constant and so true.

To her the work of Sunday-school teaching was a matter of careful and religious self-consecration. To that end she embraced most eagerly the means afforded her in such agencies as the minister's religious classes. To an unquenchable love of the faith she cherished she added a wisely-acquired ability to commend it to the simplest, or to plead for it with thoughtful adherents of other systems of religious faith.

These characteristics, so marked in her, pointed her out as an ideal correspondent under the Postal Mission. When, to the grief of her friends and scholars, enfeebled health compelled her to resign her duties as a Sunday-school teacher, the work of the Postal Mission enlisted the willing service of her heart as well as of her mind.

Long as was her time of weakness, and of pain, her spirit seized the occasion of discharging the task, which was, to her, nothing but a delight. Into her sick chamber came letters not only from distant districts, but from all quarters of the world. From Canada her pleadings called one, who is now a useful, and a respected minister of our faith; and, from this sweet spirit in its frail tabernacle went out the words of faith and hope, on behalf of a more simple and uplifting trust in God, and in human nature. She held the work of the Postal Mission to be more than the prompt despatch of pamphlets and papers asked for.

Between her and her correspondents there grew a wonderful confidence, that moved many of them to consult her on much that interested them, apart from theological matters; and when still heavier times of suffering and of growing weakness bade her resign her loved work in this direction into other and kindly hands, the grateful testimonies to her influence were as heartfelt as they were manifold.

She has left behind a memory, a lesson, and an encouragement for all, and especially for her loving associates and fellow-teachers, who gathered round her life-long friend, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, at Arno's Vale Cemetery, in thankfulness to God for a life of pure thought, of sacred purpose, and of faithful duty.

We regret that in the report of the proceedings at Manchester College, Oxford, last week, there was a mistake in our reference to the gift of the copy of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper," placed in the College Chapel. It is given by Mrs. Bramley, in memory of her late husband, Mr. Herbert Bramley, of Sheffield, and in pursuance of his express wish as we recorded. The name was printed "Edward" by mistake.

Referring to Mr. Manning's history of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and the date there given of the ministry of the Rev. J. L. Short as 1865–74, Miss F. A. Short writes to us from Paris:—

My Father immediately succeeded Dr. Herford, who left in September, 1864, and, if a treacherous memory serve me, he stayed one Sunday later than he would have done, in order to preach the funeral sermon of the last of the Shores, of Meersbrook Park, so that I believe my father actually began his ministry on the first Sunday of October, 1864, and he left in September, 1874.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

About 700 years ago a little lad named Francis Bernardino was living in the old city of Assisi, in Italy. His father was a rich cloth merchant, whose great aim in life was to heap up wealth and gain a place for himself as one of the chief citizens in Assisi. The merchant's little son was like a prince among his playfellows. None were so richly clothed as he, and he was made leader by them in all their games. He had a beautiful voice, and the people of Assisi used to come to their house-doors to watch him as he passed along the narrow streets, with a flock of children following him, singing as he went. As he grew older his father, who wished to make him a skilful, well-known merchant, was glad that he should associate with the young nobles and wealthy youths of the neighbourhood. He denied him nothing that he wished for, gave him beautiful clothes and purses of money, and encouraged him to hold grand feasts for his companions, who made him their leader just as the children had done in his boyhood. The quiet old streets of Assisi used to ring at night with the songs of these young revellers when their feasts were over; and the foolish merchant was proud of his popular son and wished for no better kind of life for him.

But the time came when Francis woke up to the sad thought that he was wasting his life. Good influences touched him, and he began to long most earnestly to live as Christ had lived on earth, and so entire was the change in him that he became known as Saint Francis of Assisi; and this is the name by which he is held in loving reverence to-day. We have saints among us now, though they are not known by that name—men and women who live Christ-like lives because they bring the spirit of Christ into the work they have to do and the place they are set to live in—they try to live as Christ would have done if he had been in their place. But 700 years ago things were different, and to Francis Bernardino this did not seem possible. So he gave up all that once was dear to him, and lived like the poorest man in Italy, and spent his days in tenderly helping every one who needed help, leading wicked people to forsake their sins—trying to do in Italy just what Christ had done in Palestine.

But I want to tell you specially of one way in which St. Francis tried to be like Christ. He was so gentle and tender to all the dumb creatures about him. There are many stories which tell us how the "little brothers and sisters," as he called the animals and birds, loved him. One day a leveret caught in a trap was brought to him. "Come to me, brother leveret," he said, as it was set free at his command. It ran for refuge to him, and he took it up and caressed it; but when he put it down upon the ground that it might run away, it came back to him again and again, and had to be carried into the forest before it would seek its freedom. He never passed a worm or creeping thing lying in his path, it is said, without putting it in a place of safety. Most of all, he loved the birds. On one occasion, when he was preaching, we are told, the swallows sang so loudly that he could not make himself heard. It was thought they liked to hear his voice. "It is my turn to speak," he said to them, "little sister swallows, hearken to the word of God; keep silent and be very quiet till I have finished." Often, it is said, the birds flocked round him, as if to bid him welcome, and when he spoke to them "they began to arch their necks, to spread out their wings, to open their beaks as if to thank him, while he went up and down in their midst stroking them with the border of his tunic, and sending them away at last with his blessing." Such stories, if they are not all true, show how people were impressed by his gentle ways with the living creatures round him.

Probably many of you children who read this column have dear friends among the animals, and may like to read the story of what I once saw a dog do. I was standing one evening by the side of a lake among the mountains. There was a beautiful sunset glow in the sky and a flock of birds was flying home across the water. It was a very peaceful scene till some holiday makers came down to the lake-side, got into a fishing-boat and with much talk and laughter rowed away from shore. I watched the waves breaking round their boat and the golden light shining on their dripping oars, when, suddenly they ceased rowing and threw overboard two barking dogs. One was a large black curly dog, the other a very small brown one, and they were plainly shown by the men in the boat that they must swim to shore if they would not be drowned. They set out bravely—their masters bending over their oars to watch which swimmer would win the race. By and by one could see that the dogs began to pant and grow weary. As was to be expected the large dog had most strength and made most way, but even he was nearly worn out as he approached the shore. His small companion left behind in the race began to whine in terror and seemed as if he could swim no further. The large dog stopped and turned round, then looked again at the land where safety lay. What do you think he did? He toiled back through the beating waves, a weary way, and reached the spot where the soft brown head was still above the water. I saw the little dog climb upon his deliverer's back; and then, the brave swimmer, with his burden, struggled to the shore again. The small dog was saved, but nearly at the cost of his brave friend's life.

What lessons of faithfulness and self-sacrifice and courage may we not constantly learn from the dumb creatures about us! And one thing more let us remember: constantly, if we are on the watch, we may find chances to make their lives happier and to induce thoughtless people to treat them kindly. Here is a beautiful Eastern legend about the gentleness of Christ to end our column.

The story tells us that a great crowd gathered together one day in a market place in some town in Palestine. The idle people were ready for any mischief and to sneer and scoff at any object. A dead dog was lying on the ground and some of the rough men and boys gathered round it. "See!" they cried, as they spurned it with their feet; "see! what an ugly wretch! how its hide is torn!" But some one came up and bent over the forsaken, lifeless body, gently touching it, and said in pitying tones, "Nay, but see what white teeth he has; pearls are not so white." A silence fell upon the people and they slunk back ashamed, and it was said among them, "This must be Jesus of Nazareth, for who but he would find anything to praise in a dead dog?"

Frances E. Cooke.

In the second volume of Wordsworth's prose works, edited by Professor William Knight, there are some notes on Epitaphs, which include the following translation of a Latin epitaph, which, Wordsworth says, was "communicated to a lady in her childhood, and by her preserved in memory." And he adds a regret that he had not seen the original:—

She is gone—my beloved daughter Eliza is gone,
Fair, cheerful, benign, my child is gone.
Thee long to be regretted a Father mourns,
Regretted—but thanks to the most perfect God! not lost.
For a happier age approaches
When again, my child, I shall behold
And live with thee for ever.
Matthew Dobson to his dear, engaging, happy Eliza,
Who in the 18th year of her age
Passed peaceably into heaven.

Comparing this epitaph with another, written in somewhat conventional verse, which he has also quoted, Wordsworth says:—

Unquestionably, as the father in the latter speaks in his own person, the situation is much more pathetic; but, making due allowance for this advantage, who does not here feel a superior truth and sanctity, which is not dependent upon this circumstance, but merely the result of the expression and the connection of the thoughts. I am not so fortunate as to have any knowledge of the author of this affecting composition, but I much fear if he called in the assistance of English verse the better to convey his thoughts, such sacrifices would, from various influences, have been made even by him, that though he might have excited admiration in thousands, he would have truly moved no one.

Matthew Dobson was a Liverpool physician and author, and it was in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth that he erected the plain tablet of white marble on which are inscribed the tender and pathetic words in memory of his young daughter:—

Abiit
Dilecta mea filia
Elisa!
Pulchra, Jucunda, Benigna,
Mea Filia abiit!
Ingenua perquam et perquam acuta
Bonis artibus et studiis honestis ornata
Sancta et Religiosa
Mea Filia abiit!
Vale, mea Elisa, vale!
Te diu desiderandam luget pater:
Desiderandam, sed, Deo Optimo gratias, non amissam:
Nam veniet fel(i)cior ætas
Quando iterum, mea filia, te aspiciam,
Et tecum sempiterne vivam.
Matthæus Dobson, caræ, dulci et beatæ suæ Elisæ,
Quæ annos Septendecim nata,
Et A.D. 1778
In cœlum placide migravit.

In the marble of the tablet itself felcior is cut, instead of felicior. It will be noticed that the translation, as Wordsworth's friend remembered it, omits not only the date, but a considerable part of the epitaph.

It is better to be unhappy through a sense of insufficient attainments, than happy in a consistent adherence to the standards of the world.—T. K. Cheyne.

LONDON, OCTOBER 27, 1900.

CITIZEN SUNDAY.

ON the eve of the election of the new Borough Councils for London, the Churches have a great opportunity of making the voice of a true citizenship distinctly heard, and of urging upon all who are within the reach of their influence the duty of paying serious attention to this matter, and using every endeavour to secure the return of men (would that we could say women also!), as councillors for the twenty-eight new boroughs, who shall have no private and selfish ends to serve, but shall be devoted with single-hearted loyalty, and as far as possible with tried capacity, to the service of the community.

Vital interests of four and a half millions of people are concerned in the elections of Thursday next, the interests of a population greater than that of Scotland, and with this further weight added to their consideration, that the metropolis cannot be self-contained, but more than any other great city, for good or ill, must affect the whole country. Imagination fails to grasp the meaning of such figures, but no thoughtful resident in London can fail to be oppressed by the magnitude of the problem involved in the good government of such stupendous masses of people, or by the lamentable failure of the old authorities, so various and confused, and so often corrupted by sordid interests, to secure the health and even the decent comfort of those who are forced to live in the poorer quarters of the city.

The County Council, since its establishment in 1888, has done great things for London, particularly in the matter of open spaces and street improvements, but it is only at the beginning of what has to be done in the matter of insanitary property and the decent housing of the poor. One great gain has been the strengthening of the sense of unity and of responsibility for the welfare of the community as a whole, and it has been feared that the Act of last year now coming into force, by which London (excluding the City) is divided up into twenty-eight separate boroughs, each with a Council and Mayor of its own, might have an opposite and hurtful effect. It may be, however, that this concentration of attention on separate areas, each a considerable community in itself, and such as can be grasped by the imagination, may generate a new spirit of local patriotism, and that among the different boroughs, working harmoniously with the County Council, there may arise a healthy rivalry in good government, which can have only the happiest results. Such, at any rate, we must devoutly hope may be the case.

Under the Housing of the Working Classes Act the new Borough Councils will have power to proceed summarily against owners of houses pronounced unfit for human habitation, and in other ways to deal with unhealthy areas; they will have power to erect new houses both within and without their own limits, without which little can be done to alleviate the present misery of over-crowding. They will be charged also with the appointment of sanitary officers and inspectors, the enforcement of the Acts gainst over-crowding, the certification of proper water supply, the enforcement of the Factory Acts, so far as they affect domestic workshops, they will be the authority to adopt the Acts for Public Libraries, Baths, and Wash-houses. Thus it will be seen how intimately their action will affect the welfare of the people, and how essential it is to secure at once the services of the best men. On this subject the London branch of the Christian Social Union has issued an appeal, signed by Canon SCOTT HOLLAND, from which we cannot do better than quote :—

> No effort should be spared to secure that the men brought forward and elected shall have no axes of their own to grind, but shall bring to the work a sound public conscience, integrity, and independence of character, a keen and experienced interest in the well-being of the poor, and a sturdy faith in the tremendous task which they undertake. They must believe in what they are about. They must believe that London can be a far sweeter, happier, purer place than it has ever attempted yet to be. They must co-operate loyally with the central Authority, which has done so much to create hope in what London might achieve, and with which the Councils will have such intimate relations. It would, indeed, be a supreme disaster if the new Boroughs found themselves in collision with the work of the London County Council.

And further, having enumerated the special points of good government, on which stress has chiefly to be laid, the appeal urges the duty of keeping these elections free from the false issues of political partisanship, and keeping prominently before the public the great purpose for which the Councils are to be chosen.

To get the right men we must lift the true flag: we must appeal to the good cause. And our cause is London, with its impotent multitudes, miserably over-crowded, hideously housed, cruelly rented; ill-drained, ill-lighted, stricken down by the terrible death-rate, beggared of all that can go by the name of home; with no relief but that which the reeking public-houses offer; forced to crowd in ever-thickening swarms into congested and insanitary areas; without the power, the knowledge, or the leisure which might enable them to exercise the honour of citizenship.

The recent excitement of the General Election has, we fear, prevented the public from fully realising the gravity of the issues now at stake in these new municipal elections, and the clamour of political party has unhappily been allowed to make itself heard in the present contests. The defenders of vested interests will be only too apt to take advantage of the raising of such false issues, to gain their own ends, and there is therefore the more urgent need for all those who believe in the people's welfare as the one end to be served, to strain every nerve to secure the election of independent candidates, to vote themselves, and to induce others to vote for men pledged to the principles of good government, that shall consider above all the needs of the poor, the health and the enlightenment of the whole community.

The minutes of the Council meeting on April 24 having been read and confirmed, the secretary read the report of the Executive Committee as follows:—

REPORT.

Since the date of the annual meeting of the Association, the Executive Committee have met three times, and there have been twelve meetings of sub-committees. The Committee at their first meeting appointed eight sub-committees for dealing with the varied work of the Association. Each of these sub-committees elects its own chairman, and the following are the appointments for 1900-1901:—Finance Committee: Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke; Scottish Committee: Mr. Percy Preston; Mission Committee: the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Publications Committee: Mr. George H. Leigh; Indian Committee: the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A.; Civil Rights Committee: Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee; General Purposes Committee: the Rev. James Harwood, B.A.; Special Services Committee: Mr. J. F. Schwann. The detailed work of the Association is considered and reported upon to the Executive by one or other of these sub-committees. Some conception of the amount of detailed office work that goes on may be gathered from the fact that the secretary alone, apart from the book-room business, or the receipt and acknowledgment of subscriptions, received 1,098 letters from July 2 to the present date, although this period covers the holiday season.

Finance.—The following is a brief statement of the receipts from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 1900:—Balance from 1899, £23; subscriptions, £1,404; collections, £128; donations, £76; dividends, £762; book-room receipts, £879; special sources, £60. The expenditure for the same period included grants to congregations and missionaries, £1,501; foreign work, £292; grants of books and pamphlets, £205; deputations, £127; trade accounts, £505; rent and office expenses, £201; salaries of staff, £529. The whole of the ordinary income received up to date has been expended, and £30 in addition. Legacies have been received from the executors of Mrs. Janson, £50; Mr. J. Harrop, £75; Mr. C. Wragg, £50; and Mr. T. Young, £50.

Publications.—Since the last meeting of the Council the following books and pamphlets have been published:—"Book of Daily Strength," edited by the Rev. V. D. Davis; "Religion in Literature and Religion in Life," by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke; "The Imitableness of Christ's Character," by Dr. Channing, published as one of the pages for religious inquirers. A pamphlet by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, dealing with the Rev. R. J. Campbell's view of the doctrine of the Trinity is in the press, and will be issued shortly. A little book containing four discourses on "Jesus of Nazareth, lessons of his life, death, and resurrection, learnt at Ober Ammergau," by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, will be published shortly. Several tracts have been reprinted. A further edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal" is being reprinted, and a list of tunes, prepared by Mr. Howard Barnard and Mr. John Harrison, will be bound up with the hymnal. The Secretary has prepared and published a "Handbook for Ministers," containing services for baptism, dedication, marriage, and burial, with special hymns and readings. Arrangements have again been made for publishing the "Essex Hall Year Book" and the "Pocket Almanac for 1901," but it has been decided not to send a free copy of the former to subscribers to the Association unless they specially desire one. Professor Cary's volume on "The Synoptic Gospels," in the "International Handbooks Series," "The Life of Dr. Martineau," by A. W. Jackson. "The Hexateuch, arranged from its Constituent Documents," edited by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and G. H. Battersby, and other new books have been added to the books kept for sale at Essex Hall.

Grants of 1,609 books, 41,813 pamphlets, valued at £205, have been distributed from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30, 1900. Parcels of pamphlets and leaflets have recently been sent to congregations for use in connection with special services and lectures in the Manchester district. Parcels will be forwarded in a few days containing in all about 30,000 pamphlets, in addition to 20,000 copies of the leaflet, "Unitarian Affirmations," which were specially ordered by the Committee of the District Association.

Mission Work.—The following grants have been made since the last meeting of the Council:—Aberdare, £10 for supplies; Blackpool, £15 for school building; Billingshurst and New Pound, £10 for special work; Ciliau Aeron, £25 for the new church; Chorlton-cum-Hardy, £50 for new church; Crewkerne, £10 for supplies; Deal, £10 for cleansing and repairs; Gloucester, £20 to pay off debt on the building; Halstead, £5 for supplies; Heaton Moor, £50 for the new church; Eastern Union Postal Mission, £2; King's Lynn, £5 for supplies; Loughborough, £5 to pay off deficit; Newton Abbot, £10 for supplies; Plymouth, £10 for special services; Pontypridd, £10 to pay off deficit; South-East Wales Society for missionary, £15; Wood Green, £100 for a new church building. The annual grants for 1901 will be considered by the committee in January, and forms of application may be obtained from the secretary at Essex Hall. The work at several churches is at present suffering from a lack of a sufficient number of able and devoted men prepared to undertake the duties of the ministry.

McQuaker Trust.—The Council will be glad to learn that the congregation at Aberdeen have determined to build a new church in a central position of the town, towards the cost of which the McQuaker Trustees have agreed to make a grant of £750, to be paid in three yearly instalments of £250. Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar has visited and preached at Dundee and Edinburgh, and his discourses were much appreciated. The Rev. A. C. Henderson left Kilmarnock in June last, and has since retired from the ministry; the congregation is now seeking another minister. The trustees have resolved to make arrangements for some special lectures and services, with the view of awakening and renewing interest in the Unitarian cause in Scotland. The two lectures on "Religion in Literature and Religion in Life," by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, given at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, as reported to the Council at the last meeting, have been published in a book, and should command a ready sale.

The Rev. A. E. Parry continues his Postal Mission work in Scotland. He reports that during the last twelve months he sent out a great many books and pamphlets, and he has now seventy-nine correspondents. The McQuaker Trustees have elected Mr. James Ewart, M.A., to the Scholarship of £100 a year, tenable for three years, offered by them to a Scotch University graduate, to enable him to study at Manchester College, Oxford, in preparation for the Unitarian ministry in Scotland.

Foreign Mission Work.—The Committee have promised a further grant of £25 for this year towards the support of the work which the Rev. R. H. Lambley is doing at Melbourne. The Rev. T. R. Skemp is at present temporarily occupying the pulpit at Sydney, and if his health improves he may, perhaps, settle there. The Committee have promised a grant of £25 to the congregation for this year in aid of their work. Letters have been received from the Rev. William Jellie, the minister, and Mr. Orr Polley, the secretary, of the Church at Auckland, reporting that the services are well attended and great interest is being manifested in Unitarianism. The Hall in which the services were held has proved too small. It is hoped that before long the congregation will have a church building of their own. At Copenhagen the congregation is increasing. The services of the Rev. U. Birkedal, formerly of the State Church, have been secured, and it is hoped that a strong and self-supporting congregation will be formed in time. The Committee have made a further grant of £10 in aid of the movement. A new Unitarian church has been erected at Ottawa, the capital of Canada, where the congregation is growing steadily; and in order to show the sympathy of the Unitarians of England with the excellent work that is being done there, a grant of £100 in aid of the new building, which will be opened next week, has been made.

Work in India.—Letters and reports have been received from the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams giving an account of his work as the representative of the Association in India. He conducted services at Darjeeling in the Brahmo Somaj Mandir every Sunday for several weeks, when many residents and visiting Brahmos from Calcutta and other parts of Bengal attended; he also delivered five lectures on week-days in public halls, which attracted large audiences of people belonging to various classes and creeds. More recently, Mr. Williams held English services at the Albert Hall, at Calcutta, on Sunday mornings, and they have proved very successful, being attended by congregations of over two hundred. He also lectured several times at the Calcutta University, when an average of five hundred people were present, including senior students, college professors, lawyers, barristers, and doctors. Many people at Calcutta have urged Mr. Williams to continue the lectures and services there; but he is compelled to fulfil some other long-promised engagements in the North-West of India and at Bombay.

Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, M.A., and Mr. S. Kamalkar have returned to India, taking with them the good wishes of all who knew them. The former stayed in England two years as the Indian scholar, the latter came over for one year at his own expense. The Committee hope that they will now be better able to help to spread the truths of liberal religion among their own people. Mr. Moti Bulasa, M.A., the new Indian student, was expected to arrive in England more than a week ago, but the boat has been delayed, and he will not be able to reach Oxford for a day or two longer. A large number of books and pamphlets have lately been sent out to India, and the Committee are assured that great benefit is derived by the recipients from the perusal of this literature.

Special Services and Lectures.—Arrangements have been made for the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke to preach at the following places up to Christmas, 1900:—Oct. 14, Rochdale (M.), Oldham (E.); Oct. 28, Southampton; Nov. 4, Oxford (Manchester College Chapel); Nov. 18, Platt Chapel, Manchester; Dec. 2, Burnley (M.), Padiham (E.); Dec. 16, Bradford. It is hoped that a course of six Sunday Morning Services will be given in London early in 1901. The Committee are glad to announce that they have arranged for the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, to deliver a course of six lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," on Tuesday evenings at Essex Hall. Upwards of 200 people attended the first lecture last Tuesday evening. Prof. Carpenter has consented to give the same course of lectures at Bolton, Leeds, and Liverpool, from the end of January to the beginning of March, 1901.

Having referred to the attendance of representatives of the Association at the annual meetings of various societies, and to the autumn meeting of the Association, reported in last week's INQUIRER, the report continued:—

Association Sunday.—A letter has been addressed to the various congregations throughout the country again inviting them to take a collection on Nov. 18, or some other convenient date, in aid of the funds of the Association. Last year 183 congregations contributed £549, and the Committee sincerely trust that it may be possible to increase the number this year. At no previous period has there been greater need or larger opportunity for the work of the Association, and the Committee earnestly appeal for the support of all who prize the principles and faith for which Unitarians stand. Unfortunately, many generous subscribers have died recently, and the Committee would rejoice to see their places filled by new subscribers.

Obituary.—The Committee regret to report the death of Mr. Richard Eve, of Aldershot, a man beloved for his sterling character, devoted to works of public usefulness, who for several years regularly attended the meetings of the Council. They have to lament the death of Mr. Charles E. Pinnock, of Newport, Isle of Wight, the worthy son of a worthy father, who also occupied himself with public affairs to the great advantage of the community in which he lived. Mr. J. T. Ellerbeck, of Liverpool, though less widely known, was a steadfast friend and supporter of every good cause. The Committee desire to place on record their appreciation of the valuable services performed by these members of the Council, and to convey to the relatives of the deceased their respectful sympathy in the great loss which they have sustained.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the reception of the report, dwelt on several points of special interest, and the SECRETARY added some particulars as to the movement in Copenhagen, which had begun with the publication of Det Glade Budskab by Mr. Theo. Berg, and the subsequent formation of a Unitarian Brotherhood, out of which had grown regular religious services, as stated in the report.

Miss SHARPE, referring to her recent visit to Unitarian churches in the North of Ireland, asked whether more recognition could not be given to them by way of encouragement at the annual meeting of the Association.

The report having been received, the Rev. H. W. PERRIS moved, and Mr. H. BLESSLEY seconded, a resolution instructing the Secretary to send letters to the relatives of the deceased members conveying the sympathy of the Council.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved, and Mr. I. S LISTER seconded, a resolution of cordial thanks to the congregations at Sheffield for their hospitable entertainment of the representatives of the Association at the recent autumn meeting.

The Secretary then read the following report as to the recent meeting of the American Unitarian Association in Boston:—

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was represented at the special meetings, organised by the American Unitarian Association at Boston in May, 1900, by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., and the Secretary. The meetings were very largely attended, were full of enthusiasm, and animated by a desire to do more and better work for the Unitarian cause in America in the future than had been done in the past, glorious as that past had been. The Unitarian cause in America means the cause of freedom and progress in religious thought, and beneficent helpfulness in all that concerns the life of men and nations. The hospitality and welcome extended to the delegates was exceedingly generous and hearty. Both Mr. Hargrove and the Secretary had various opportunities of seeing something of the work of the churches in different parts of the United States and of Canada, and their letters in THE INQUIRER and the Christian Life have already made the Unitarians of England acquainted with their experiences and impressions. The Committee of the B. and F.U.A. have resolved to begin to make arrangements for the reception of the President of the American Unitarian Association, and of the other delegates who will accompany him, at the Anniversary Meetings in London during Whit-week, 1901, and who, along with delegates expected from the Continent of Europe, India, Japan, Australasia, and elsewhere, will take part in an International Council of Unitarians and other liberal religious thinkers and workers in pursuance of a scheme adopted at Boston in May last, when representatives were present from many foreign lands. In addition to the official representatives of the B. and F.U.A., Miss Pritchard and Mr. Ion Pritchard attended meetings not only at Boston but at Chicago, as the representatives of the Sunday School Association. Mr. and Mrs. Davis, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Messrs. Percy and Edgar M. Taylor, and Mr. Winder, of Bolton, and other visitors from England, were present at several of the meetings. Mrs. Hargrove also accompanied her husband on his journeys.

Miss TAGART moved:—

That in the opinion of this Council it is desirable that the attention of District Associations, Provincial Assemblies, and Local Unitarian Societies should be directed to the importance of obtaining and preserving records of all endowments and trust funds which exist for the benefit of the various chapels and school-rooms in their respective districts, along with a list of trustees; and that the secretary of each association, assembly, and society be urged to keep a book containing these records, and at each annual meeting should endeavour to correct and bring the information up to date. Further, that the matter be referred to the Civil Rights Committee, to carry out these recommendations.

In moving this resolution Miss Tagart said they were not competent to give directions, but they could strongly urge the adoption of such measures. There was a want of public interest among Unitarians in the property they had inherited. It was neglected and in some cases lapsed for want of healthy public opinion and due care. There were cases in which the trust-deeds could not be found and it was not known who the trustees were. In the present condition of the country and the rapid changes that were going on, they ought not to allow any plot of ground or any building to slip from their hands. It was an extremely difficult and delicate thing to interfere with trustees, but if a little more public spirit were shown and a desire for publicity, there should be no difficulty in keeping a proper record in each district, and in maintaining the trusts. That matter had been brought forcibly home to her by a speech of Mr. Asquith's in 1890 on disestablishment and disendowment in Wales, in which he said that if there were no high ideal in regard to what should be done with such property there never could be any advance in the religious and educational uses to which it might be put; and she further quoted a saying of John Knox's at the time of the Reformation, when the old endowments were falling in, to the effect that what they needed was a devout imagination as to how best to use such property and such trusts. She hoped the matter would not be allowed to drop, and there would be no more neglect of the property entrusted to their care.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. P. W. CLAYDEN, and supported by Mr. E. Clephan, Mr. Geoffrey New, and Mr. H. Stannus, all of whom from experience urged cogent reasons for its adoption. In reply to a question from Sir Roland Wilson, the Chairman said that the churches contemplated were those included in the Year Book. In reply to a further question from Mr. G. J. Notcutt it was explained that they were simply making a recommendation, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD then moved:—

That this meeting of the Council of the B. and F. U. A., in bidding Godspeed to Mr. Mozoomdar, begs to assure him of its cordial regard and best wishes for the success of the work with which he has been honourably associated for so many years. It would further request Mr. Mozoomdar to convey to the members of the Brahmo Somaj its continued deep sympathy and earnest hopes for an ever-growing influence on the religious progress of India.

Mr. Harwood spoke of Mr. Mozoomdar's life-long devotion to the work of the Brahmo Somaj in India, a work of religious reformation, which must be at the root of any social reform for which they might look in that great country. They had tried during the last few years to give some practical help in that work, and he begged Mr. Mozoomdar to be assured that they were as deeply interested as ever in his country and in the work of religious reformation with which he was so closely identified.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, in seconding, referred to what had been done in response to the terrible need of the Indian Famine. The fund of £2,558 which they had been able to raise, and the whole of which, except £1 18s. for postage, had been remitted to India, had proved of the greatest service, and as the pressure of distress was now abating, the work would end with the present month. Mr. Pritchard gave details of the relief work, which he has already described in these columns, and spoke with special satisfaction of the fraternal manner in which all sections of the Brahmo Somaj had worked together in the administration of relief.

Mr. MOZOOMDAR, in acknowledging the resolution, was very warmly received. The historical connection between the Unitarian community and the Brahmo Somaj was, he said, a subject of deep interest, because it came about in an unforced and spontaneous manner. The Rajah Rammohun Roy was a man of whom they knew little before he came to this country; and they new less of the manners and customs and views which he represented; but they had helped and encouraged him and gave him deep sympathy. Then when Keshub Chunder Sen came forty years afterwards they gave him an even more enthusiastic welcome; without the facilities afforded by their committee and by their late lamented representative Mr. Spears, he could not have done the work he did. And for himself, in his various wanderings in England and America, he found himself at home in Unitarian homes, and in Unitarian congregations he found listeners, friends and sympathisers. At no time had those relations been closer than at present. The growth of that kinship had its source in the purpose of the Spirit of God, and whatever impulse came from that source was bound to grow and deepen and produce fruit acceptable to all.

Of recent years they had done certain things which the members of the Brahmo Somaj and the liberal Hindus in Bengal could not forget. He referred to the help given at the time of the great earthquake of 1897 for the restoration of their Brahmo Somaj buildings, to the Scholarship for Indian students at Manchester College, and, above all, to the help given in relief of the sufferings of the famine. He read passages from a letter he had received from a devout and enthusiastic missionary engaged in the work of relief, who said the work had given him "an uplift in the direction of believing in God's presence and in self-sacrificing love," and expressed a wish that he could give to their Unitarian friends a graphic description of the good accomplished. He felt ill at ease, he said, to receive thanks for the help given, because it was not he, it was God who was the real giver, through their friends, the Unitarians of England, who felt for their fellow-beings so far away.

That, Mr. Mozoomdar added, was but one instance of the warm appreciation and genuine deep gratitude felt by their people. The good accomplished was not physical only but moral, and not to those who received alone, but to those who gave.

He and they alike stood for universal religion. He did not believe in one conquering religion that should absorb in itself all the religions of the world. Universal religion did not mean uniformity in creed, worship or organisation, but union of spirit, aim and object, of goodwill, and in the God-ward course of spiritual culture. Such union was growing in their midst. With different name, organisation and even processes of development, they yet had the same inward experiences and the same sympathy in good works. When they were one in heart and in God-ward progress, the foundation-stone of universal religion was laid. Their religion in India was not based on theology, on creeds, or so-called revelation, but on the simple religious instincts of human nature. They reasoned, and had a great literature, to which was added also the literature of the West, but in the last resort, when it came to the relation of soul and soul, they fell back on the intuitions and the yearnings of human nature after a knowledge of God. Whatever religion was true had only a few principles. The more complex they made it, the more were the simple principles lost and they were forsaken by the true spirit. The secret of the success of the Brahmo Somaj lay in its devotional fervour. In no other way could they reach the masses of the people. Strangers to culture, literature, theology, history and speculation, they were yet touched by fervent devotion. It was especially the prayers of Chunder Sen, his devoutness, his deep impulses and supplications of God, that brought the most profound response from all who heard him. One of their difficulties in India was to reconcile religious opinion with practical morality. They said of the Western nations that first they sent the missionary, then the merchant and then the soldier. Thus there was a divergence between the religious and the moral code which some day must be remedied. What they needed was pure and irreproachable character, and holiness of thought and life, such as transfigured the Son of God on the mountain. In Christ they found those principles most fully illustrated.

If Christianity had any world-wide mission, it was in teaching a higher morality, deeper character than they knew before. Asceticism they had before, and Buddha's lofty code of morals. Christ's teaching was not complex, it was simply the practical side of his piety. Holy living followed from the great cause of inner religion. Of late they had attached the greatest importance to personal influence. Principles were abstract; when they took flesh and character and soul, and worked before men in forms they understood, then they became the bread and water of mankind. Hence of late some of them had attached the greatest importance to the personality of Christ, but not separated from the personality of others in their own country. Devout, holy humanity drew a circle round them, of the prophets of all countries, with Christ as the human centre, and God the divine centre. They believed in the power of universal religion to assimilate the truth in everything. The organism that could not assimilate was bound to perish. They had assimilated the great truths of Hinduism and of Christianity, and in science devoutly recognised a revelation of more of the handiwork of God than in many an old book of scripture. As the eternal law of progress applied to the soul, so to the life and progress of religion, continually supplied from the great storehouse of God's truth and goodness. As of Unitarianism, so of the Brahmo Somaj it was sometimes said that their work was done, because others were adopting the principles they held. But while monotheism was their corner-stone, it was only one of their principles, if the most important. They had to show that it was no abstract creed. Its influence must permeate the soul, the household, society, and the land. It meant the harmony of devotion and holy character, the harmony of one man with all, one race with all, and so long as there was one error, one disharmony in society, one superstition to be removed, one act of holiness unachieved, the vocation of the Brahmo Somaj would not be gone. But when all that was accomplished, they would be ready to lose their name and place and merge themselves in the universal kingdom of God, which would include all men, and make the earth as holy and glorious as heaven.

At the conclusion of Mr. Mozoomdar's address Mr. Harwood called attention to the presence of another distinguished Indian guest, Professor J. C. Bose, of the Presidency College, Calcutta. Distinguished as a teacher of science, they greeted him also as a member of the Brahmo Somaj, a sentiment which the meeting warmly endorsed.

Professor Bose, in acknowledging the greeting, spoke of the gratitude they in India felt for English sympathy, and referred especially to the value of the work which was being done by the Rev. S. F. Williams, by his literary as well as his specifically religious teaching.

The meeting then terminated, and on the invitation of the Committee tea was served.

GATEACRE BICENTENARY.

The Bicentenary of Gateacre Chapel was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, Oct. 13 and 14. On Sunday special sermons were preached by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, of Gee Cross, and in the afternoon the Rev. J. C. Hirst, minister of the chapel, addressed the children of the Sunday-school, and medals commemorating the Bicentenary were distributed.

On Monday evening a public meeting was held in the schoolroom, under the presidency of Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P., a son of the Rev. Noah Jones, formerly minister of the chapel.

The Chairman referring to the past history of the chapel, and especially to the ministry of the Revs. Dr. Shepherd, Noah Jones and G. Beaumont, said that it was a remarkable record, with three ministries which together covered a hundred years. The work there for the past hundred years had been quiet and unobtrusive, but it had been a noble work. It was an inheritance not to be undervalued, and he appealed to them, especially to the laity, on whom success depended, to carry it on.

Mr. J. L. Thornely then read an historical sketch, which he had prepared, and to which in its published form we shall have another opportunity of referring. It traced the history of the congregation from the early days of Toleration and the building of the chapel in 1700. The Rev. J. Lawton was minister from 1715 to his death in 1747, and he was followed by the Rev. Richard Godwin, who ministered there for forty years. With the Rev. J. Edwards, who followed, the teaching of the chapel became distinctly Unitarian. Next came Dr. Shepherd's ministry of fifty-six years, leaving the record of a remarkable personality, of trenchant political influence, of scholarly ability, marked by his "Life of Poggio Bracciolini," and other works, and by the success of the school which he carried on for many years. He was the friend of William Roscoe, William Rathbone, and other leading citizens of Liverpool. The assistant of his latter years, the Rev. Lewis Lewis, only remained for a year after Dr. Shepherd's death, but the Woolton Mechanics Institute owed its origin to him, and also the chapel library and Sunday-school. The Rev. Noah Jones introduced some wholesome reforms into the congregation's habits and charities, and was also responsible for the substitution of an organ for the old pitch-pipe. On Mr. Jones's death in 1861 the Rev. George Beaumont entered on his fruitful ministry of thirty-four years, during which the chapel was re-pewed and otherwise renovated, the parsonage "Chapelstead" was bought, and the school buildings erected. That was in the last year of Mr. Beaumont's life, who died in 1897, and was succeeded by the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, the present minister.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong said 200 years was a long time, not only in the history of a congregation, but in the history of the world and religion. That period covered a great change in the thoughts and beliefs of men, and the general conduct of life, and yet Gateacre chapel, though not more than an hour's walk from the great city, had retained a certain amount of primitive rusticity. It was essentially a country church, and the little village had gathered round it, and made it the centre of intellectual, and social, and religious life. Referring to Mr. Beaumont's ministry, he said it was beautiful to think that a man, without the great gifts and eloquence to make him conspicuous in a large sphere, could for a third of a century have done such a grand work, a slow sympathetic patient moulding of character. He believed that Unitarians had a great work to do, a great deal to teach, and a great deal to learn. They had to learn to be very humble, and patient, and full of faith and love. Whether they were in the right or wrong, and on that question he personally had not a shadow of a doubt, they must work shoulder to shoulder with the men of other denominations to bring in the kingdom of God. He did not fancy that that kingdom would know much about the names of the different sects. He thought that in all denominations there was in the best men and women, the essence and fragrance of that which was for the salvation of the world.

The Rev. W. J. Jupp, of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, congratulated the congregation at Gateacre on their treasuries of memory, the joys of the present, and the hopeful promises for the future.

The Rev. Dr. Klein traced the evolution of Unitarian belief from the past when they had tried to find a bond of unity in an intellectual formula or creed, to the present when they found a bond of union which gave moral unity whilst leaving the intellect free. The solution was not on the surface of their experience, but under the surface wherein lay the purest revelation of Jesus. They found that the real unity the Master had worked for was unity of spirit, love, and affections, and so gradually they had solved the problem, not only for themselves, but for the world. And so they met that night representing the sum of 200 years of human efforts, aspirations, contritions, hopes, prayers, and tears, and they trusted it had not all been in vain, but that it had laid deep down in their hearts the foundation of something deeper than they had known, wider than they had dreamt of, and which at last would bind their human spirits together, and enable them to realise the meaning of that human brotherhood in which was contained, as they believed, the secret of the religion that would bind the world one day, when the hope of solving impossible problems would have died out, and when men face to face with the realities of nature should know how to reconcile those facts with the cravings of the eternal human spirit.

The Rev. H. A. McCullagh, M.A., Wesleyan minister, joined cordially in the congratulations of the occasion. He hoped God's blessing would rest on all who tried to do good and bring about the fuller establishment in their midst of the kingdom of God.

The Rev. J. C. Hirst proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. H. E. Dowson, the Chairman, speakers, and chapel choir for their respective parts in the celebration. He expressed his regret that Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, the oldest member of the congregation, was not able to be present, but they had his sympathy in the fullest measure. He felt almost too humbled to speak on another point, but when he thought of those who had gone before he did hope that the work which had gone on in the past would not be unworthily carried on in the future, and that when another 100 years had passed his ministry, whether long or short, might be recalled in a line or two of an historical sketch to the effect that the minister who followed so many good men at least tried to do his best.

The motion was seconded by Mr. G. Dale, and the Chairman having responded, the meeting terminated.

THE OBLIGATION OF FREEDOM.

The following is a passage from the sermon preached by the Rev. F. K. Freeston at the recent meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern counties at Horsham:—

Does our Faith turn our Freedom into Obligation?—None have used more often than we the grand old watchwords "Freedom" and "Liberty." None have worked harder, suffered more than our forefathers to place their privileges in our hands. Free Inquiry, Free Religion, Freedom from tests at the universities, Free Teaching of Theology at Manchester College, Free Trusts, Free Churches—what simply priceless advantages are ours, and still so largely only ours. But on what terms are we allowed all this liberty? They are not easy: they demand imperatively that we shall obey it, carry it out, as an absolute duty, and not merely quote it as history. These free things are but means towards ends, not ends in themselves; they are conditions to observe, tools with which to build, foundations to be laid, and, though they release us from the state of slaves, they still keep us under orders. Freedom without obligation is a dangerous possession. The note that should ring in our ears is obedience, the recognition that our freedom has a constant, urgent claim upon us for grateful strenuous service. I do not hear this note struck or this claim rung out either at our gatherings or in our publications; but I find it the clear key-note of the most earnest teachers of our age—Emerson, Robertson, Kingsley, Ruskin, and many others. Knowledge, advantage, opportunity, says Emerson, do not hold the mastery. "He that has more obedience than I, masters me." The possession of an unhindered Free Faith, as we call it, is not the limit of our want. "I do not want to possess a faith," says Kingsley: "I want a faith to possess me." The right of Free Inquiry and the claim of private judgment may be viewed from another side. "I claim no right of private judgment," wrote Froude to Dr. Boyd; "it is the right that claims me, and imposes its responsibility." Free Religion needs a further guarantee than its freedom. If any man will do God's will he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or man. "The condition of spiritual wisdom," says Robertson, "the organ of spiritual knowledge, is (not freedom, but) obedience." The seventh and last of Ruskin's "Lamps," "the crowning grace of all the rest," is the Lamp of Obedience. That obedience which we expect and exact from our children under injunction, we must never cease to expect and exact from ourselves in the free allegiance of our wills to the highest and best within and above us. One of the perils of to-day, from which I think we are not free, is the notion of an irresponsible liberty, a freedom without obligation. It leads to a loose laziness of "believe what you please," to a sportive sort of "truth-hunting" at large, to a casual attitude towards the deep things of God which sometimes makes one sigh for the grave and earnest dignity of the old dogmatic theology. Freedom in religion is not a pastime but a command, and "when God commands to take the trumpet," exclaims Milton, "it is not with man's will what he shall say, or what he shall conceal." Let us heed that command. Whenever we talk of Liberty we will mean the Law of Liberty which we obey; whenever we speak of Freedom we will mean the bondage of Freedom, and not the unchartered Freedom which casts authority away. We are all under orders; we cannot do as we please. No builder can build as he likes, but in springing his walls and his arches must obey the principles of building construction. If we are to build the walls of Jerusalem, we must obey the principles of spiritual upbuilding. In the last analysis all Faith is obedience: obligation is the true freedom; the life under authority is the life of liberty. The great question in religion is to know where the seat of authority lies; but of that we are in no doubt, and we are free to obey it.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

It is a pleasure to report that our Irish pulpits are again, for the time at least, fully manned: Mr. Davison has come to Dromore and Mr. Drummond to All Souls', Belfast. The writer of this letter was a thousand miles away at the time of Mr. Davison's installation, and was not privileged, therefore, to see anything of the very cordial welcome which the Dromore people gave to their new minister; but he is assured of two things—first, that the congregation have taken their pastor to their hearts and are making him to feel that he will not toil for them in vain, and second, that Mr. Davison is not the man to neglect any opportunity of helpful ministerial service that may come to him. Irish congregations are pretty good judges of a sermon, too, and Mr. Davison has his flock well about him on the Sundays; and if our people here are not quite so keen when it comes to the steady hard work of the church, week after week and year in year out, there are not many openings for pastoral and congregational activity more promising than those presented by the brisk and busy little town of Dromore.

On his settlement at All Souls' Church, the new meeting-house of the old Second congregation, Mr. Drummond has been received with a very hearty welcome not only by the people to whom he will minister and by his brother ministers in the North of Ireland, but, if it be permitted me to say so, especially by the congregation and minister of the First church, from which the Second congregation swarmed nearly two hundred years ago. At the devotional service on Oct. 11 there was a goodly representation of ministers, and there was a very happy blending of the two congregations especially; and at the evening meeting, which was held in the lecture-hall of the First church, there were pretty well a hundred members of that church present to share in the friendly greeting extended to Mr. and Mrs. Drummond. May the day be very far distant when the two churches shall cease to feel the constraining bond of kinship and affection, or their ministers shall find that differences of method or of aim prevent their recognition of their brotherhood in a common cause! One difficulty, at any rate, is ended. The First church, for generations to come, will, doubtless, keep to the old historic site in Rosemary-street, in the very centre of business Belfast; the Second congregation moved out, a few years ago, to its new home in a quieter residential suburb. The Chairman of the Welcome Meeting quoted the opinion of an eminent Queen's Counsel, that the very "propinquity" of the two congregations had been in past years "unfortunate." Possibly. Anyhow, the command, "Thou shall love thy neighbour," is all the easier to obey when the neighbour does not live too close at hand.

We have all been busy of late with our harvest thanksgiving services, and to most of our churches here such services mean rather more than they do to our congregations across the water, for in parish after parish of Antrim and Down our people are largely of the farming class. To our town congregations, here as elsewhere, harvest services are occasions for a little brisker interest in church work, for pleasant association of young people especially in the task of church decoration, for welcome additions to our numbers at worship, and "grist to the mill" for our hospitals or for the work of our own Sunday-schools. But, in Ulster, outside the few big towns, our people are chiefly farmers, with a very natural interest, as politicians, in all land questions, and with a very necessary interest also in harvest prospects and harvest results. Indeed, it is one of the surprises which an Irish visit brings to an English Unitarian: that some of our strongest congregations are to be found in very sparsely peopled neighbourhoods. Take Moneyrea, for example. There's the church and the graveyard and the school and the manse; and there are fields and woodlands; and there are highways and by-ways that start off cross-country in every direction; but there seems to be very little else. Where are the homes of the people—the people who gather here on Sundays in such goodly numbers for worship in the quiet-looking, venerable, spacious meeting-house—the children, a hundred or so of them, who belong to the Sunday-school? They are in the farmsteads of a widely extended district, and on the Sunday they come up from all the country round, and on week-days it would be interesting to know how many miles a day, as an average thing, the faithful and energetic minister of the church travels, afoot or awheel, in his unceasing labour of pastoral visitation.

What is said of one church, if you will make the needed changes, will be true of others. Would that all our churches here had the strength and vigour of Moneyrea!

And let me say this: that anyone who should judge the work of our ministers and our congregations here without knowing or without bearing in mind the special difficulties they have to meet by their isolated position and their widely-scattered homes, would judge unjustly. We had a number of English friends over here some time ago, and they seemed so keen to find evidences of growth and progress, so flushed with their own successes in starting new churches in certain growing and progressing towns of England, and so ready to scold us because we have little of the kind to tell of here, that their visit rather caused irritation than gave encouragement and guidance. Think how much it means for our churches here—rural churches most of them—that during the past half-century or so, the population of Ireland has been lessened by one-half. And remember that, as we are told again and again, it is not generally the least enterprising and energetic people who leave a land to push their fortunes abroad; nor should we be willing to admit that our own people, either in intelligence or in strength of character and purpose, are to be ranked behind the rest. I am not trying to assign the blame, if blame there be, for the unprosperous condition of some of our weaker churches here. I am only suggesting that, if we are to judge fairly, we must judge very leniently. I doubt very much whether the time has yet come to tell the whole story of the struggles and achievements and mistakes of the non-subscribing churches of Ireland during the closing century. But whoever writes that history will need to censure in his wisdom and awake his senses that he may the better judge.

Douglas Walmsley.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—The forty-first anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, Oct. 14, when special sermons were preached by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford. Suitable anthems were rendered by the choir, and "The Promise of Life" was effectively sung by Master John S. Oldham.

Belfast: All Souls' Church (Induction of the Rev. W. H. Drummond).—On Thursday, Oct. 11, a service was held in All Souls' Church in the morning for the induction of the Rev. W. H. Drummond as minister of the congregation. The Revs. S. M. Dunbar, S. H. Mellone, and T. Dunkerley took part in the service. The Rev. D. Walmsley gave a charge to the minister, and the Rev. H. Gow to the congregation, after which the ministers gave the right hand of fellowship to Mr. Drummond, and at the conclusion of the service he pronounced the benediction. Luncheon was afterwards served to a large company, under the presidency of Mr. S. S. Millen. The secretary read a number of letters of apology for inability to be present, including one from the Rev. R. W. Seaver (St. John's, Malone), and from Dr. Drummond, of Manchester College, Oxford, who mentioned that it was just a hundred years since his father's settlement with that congregation, and added his cordial good wishes for his son's ministry with them. After the toast of "The Queen," the Chairman gave "Our Friends, Lay and Clerical," recalling the fact that on the settlement of the Rev. John Porter, seventy years ago, the Roman Catholic Bishop Crolby had cordially joined in the welcome. Messrs. Thomas Andrews, James Davidson, J. Vinycomb, and the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, President of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Association, and the Rev. H. Gow responded. The Rev. D. Walmsley proposed "Prosperity to the Second Congregation and their newly-appointed Minister" in very cordial terms, to which the Chairman and the Rev. W. H. Drummond responded. Mr. Drummond said he had a name of which he was proud, but it made it very difficult for him to live up to its entire worth. He hoped they would not begin by expecting of him the literary and poetic gifts of his grandfather or the great ability of his father. He hoped for brotherly co-operation and help from the ministers of the North of Ireland, and he should do what he could to promote goodfellowship and the welfare of their common cause. He expressed his pleasure at the letter from the Rev. R. W. Seaver, which had been read. He was himself very little of a controversialist. In general he thought he had a certain capacity for seeing what was good and to be admired in all churches, and it was his most earnest hope that he would be privileged to come into contact with men such as Mr. Seaver who belonged to other churches, and who would give him the privilege of their fellowship. He again thanked them most cordially for the way in which they had spoken of him personally, and still more for the way in which they had spoken of his father and others connected with his family. He hoped that, with their help and the grace of God, he would not be quite unworthy of the great trust and honour they had given him that day. In the evening a congregational reception was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Drummond. After tea the chair was taken by Dr. Joseph Nelson, and there was a large attendance of friends. The Chairman offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, and spoke with hope and confidence of the future of All Souls' Church. Mr. S. S. Millen also added a few words of welcome, and on behalf of the congregation gave the right hand of fellowship to Mr. Drummond. In the course of his reply, Mr. Drummond said he thought they wanted at the present moment to try and show men how Christianity embraced the whole life. They had dared to claim every accessory of music and of art in the service of religion. They had gone forth to the world saying, "Come and believe that religion is a beautiful thing," that it appealed to the artistic instincts as well as to the intellect, and it was because they had spoken that word, and because they had inaugurated that idea in the beautiful church of All Souls', that he believed it was going to continue as it had begun, to make a new appeal to the men and women of that great city, who would come there because they found the type of Christianity which appealed to the completed humanity of man. It had been his great desire to be the minister of a church which believed that intensely, and they had shown that they believed it, and therefore he said that All Souls' Church came more near to his ideal of the method or practice of liberal Christianity at the present time than any other church he knew of. For that reason he accepted the call, which a few months ago they gave him, to become minister of the church. He wished to reciprocate the brotherly feeling which had been shown to him that day. The musical programme having been gone through, the social proceedings terminated.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—Successful anniversary services in connection with the Church of the Messiah Sunday School and Mission were held on Sunday, Oct. 14, the sermons being preached by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., followed by good collections. The annual meeting of subscribers and friends was held on the following Monday evening. Tea was provided in the girls' school at 6.30, about 200 persons sitting down. The chair was taken at 7.30 by the Lady Mayoress, Mrs. C. G. Beale, between 200 and 300 persons then being present. Mr. W. B. Kenrick presented a joint report, which stated that the number of scholars attending the schools was slightly decreased as compared with last year, but there were still more than sufficient to find full occupation for the present teaching staff. An urgent appeal was therefore made for assistance. The report on the girls' school showed a decreased average attendance, but it was explained as partly due to the increased number of children who now were able to get to the country in summer. The average attendance of the teachers, however, showed an improvement. The boys' school report showed 155 names to be on the register, which was a decrease. The treasurer's accounts showed an income on the general fund of £280 and a balance in hand of £18. Mr. Tranter read a report dealing with his experiences, during the year, amongst the poor of the city. Many of the anecdotes told were of a most painful nature, some because of the evil effects of drink, while the record of heroic struggle against adversity gave pathos to others. Of the generosity of the poor to the poor Mr. Tranter gave several instances. Incidents connected with the work of the men's class were also mentioned. One of the most interesting sections of Mr. Tranter's report was that which dealt with his work amongst soldiers' wives and mothers. He had paid about 3,000 visits during the year, but none of them had given him greater pleasure than those to soldiers' homes. Mrs. Beale, in moving the adoption of the report, earnestly hoped that energetic men and women would be found to join the ranks as teachers. From personal experience she could say that they would never regret the time which they spent in the schools. She regarded it as a valuable part of her education. Many a time in later years she had been glad of the information and the insight into other lives which she could never have gained anywhere else. They rather prided themselves on their Sunday-schools, but they were apt to think that when they had served for a short time they should be exempt from further service. In that respect the Society of Friends and other denominations also could give them a lesson which rather took the conceit out of them. Many there were who went on teaching, never counting the number of years they had spent in the schools. The late Alderman White spent his whole life in teaching, and the Lord Mayor-elect had also been a scholar and a teacher all his life, and she believed intended to continue teaching during his year of office. The motion was seconded by Mr. P. Crosskey, and the report was adopted.

Burnley.—The Rev. Joseph Pollard, late of Rhyll-street Mission, London, conducted the services at the Burnley-lane Unitarian Mission Room, on Sunday morning and afternoon, Oct. 6, and on Sunday morning and evening, Oct. 21. The services were very well attended and greatly appreciated.

Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—The congregation of this little church are with much regret losing the aid of a zealous and much appreciated worker by the removal of Mr. J. A. Wadsworth and family from the Manchester District. Mr. Wadsworth has rendered timely and valuable services to the Sunday-school, and he has been very energetic in the endeavour recently made to improve the musical portion of the regular services. At the close of the service last Sunday morning, Mr. R. C. Law asked him to accept as a token of the regard and esteem of his fellow-worshippers a parcel of books, together with an accompanying letter, which was read from the pulpit. Mr. Wadsworth, in thanking the congregation, expressed his regret for the unavoidable severance that was taking place.

Clifton.—A most successful At Home was held on Oct. 19, at the Redland Park Hall Parlour, in connection with the opening of the Literary and Social Union's Winter Session. There was a large gathering, and a particularly attractive musical programme, to which friends belonging to other communities than our own were prominent contributors; altogether the evening was most bright and enjoyable. A Young People's Class of Religious Instruction has been started by the minister, and it is hoped that the satisfactory numbers attending the first of these meetings will be maintained. A Congregational Library is in process of formation, and will be opened early in November.

Crumlin, co. Antrim.—On Friday evening, Oct. 9, the Harvest Festival was held, a good congregation being present, including representatives of various denominations. The Rev. W. J. Davies, of Mount Pottinger, was the preacher. The offertory was devoted to benevolent purposes. On Sunday evening the services were conducted by the pastor, the Rev. J. Hall, when there was again a good congregation. On both evenings the Day Scholars' Choir, under Mrs. Sloan gave valuable assistance.

Darlington.—The anniversary services were held at Unity Church on Sunday, Oct. 7, when members and friends gathered in goodly numbers to listen once more to the voice of their old minister, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Carmarthen. On Monday evening the soirée took place, among the visitors being the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, and Miss Lucas, of Harrogate. A public meeting followed, under the genial presidency of Mr. Cox Walker, who, in his address, gave a résumé of twelve months' work, and alluded more particularly to the sale of work the lady members held in the early part of the year, when the sum realised was more than sufficient to meet the cost of repainting and repouting the whole of the building. Interesting addresses were given by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, the Rev. Frank Walters, and Miss Lucas.

Derby.—Successful Harvest Festival and Anniversary Services were held on Sunday at Friargate Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S. A children's service in the afternoon was conducted by Mr. Councillor W. G. Wilkins.—On Monday the annual congregational tea-meeting was held, and was largely attended. After tea in the upper schoolroom, the friends assembled in the lower schoolroom, where the pastor presided. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. K. Smith, of Belper; W. Lindsay, of Nottingham; and Mr. Charles Wibberley, late of Buenos Ayres, now of South Africa. A programme of vocal and instrumental music was furnished by Mr. S. N. Cox during the evening, and the meeting closed with the usual vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. S. D. Hall, seconded by Mr. G. Kitching.

London: Peckham.—The Rev. J. M. Whiteman, formerly minister at Avondale-road, is to lecture in the schoolroom on Friday evening, Nov. 2, on "The Black Spot on the Mersey," illustrating his address with numerous lime-light views. Mr. Whiteman has been engaged until recently as one of the missionaries at North-end Domestic Mission, Liverpool, and his experience of life among the Liverpool slums should form the nucleus of an interesting and telling address.

London: Wood Green.—Sunday last was the ninth anniversary. Dr. Mummery preached in the morning on "Our Faith," and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in the evening, on "The Message of Unitarians to the Present Age." On both occasions the Hall was fairly well filled by friends who enjoyed the services, and felt it good to be there.

Rochdale.—The Mayor-elect of Rochdale is Mr. Alderman Topper, treasurer of the Unitarian Church.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday evening, at the close of the sermon in the General Baptist Chapel, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth gave a brief address upon some of the scholars of the Sunday-school, from whom he had recently received letters, especially from South Africa and China, and made more direct reference to Edward Hagger, then in the chapel, a Marine returned from China wounded, but making good progress towards recovery. He then handed to Mr. Hagger a beautiful copy of the Variorium edition of the Bible, containing all the newest aids, and upwards of 200 photographs, with an inscription stating that it was the gift of his Sunday-school teacher and pastor.

South Wales Postal Mission.—At a meeting of the South Wales Postal Mission, held at Merthyr Tydfil Oct. 15, in connection with the quarterly meeting of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, a resolution was unanimously passed, expressing regret at the impending departure of the Rev. Dr. Griffiths from the district, and thanking him for his guidance as President, and the interest he had taken in the work generally. Mr. George Carslake Thompson has kindly consented to be President for the year ending October, 1901.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday last the annual sermons of the Sunday-school took place, the preacher being the Rev. Dr. L. de Beaumont Klein. There were large congregations morning and afternoon, and in the evening the church overflowed, and several people were unable to gain admission. The scholars, trained by Mr. Evan Greenwood, sang several hymns. It was expected that there would be a great falling off in the collections, as the cotton mills are working short time; but the committee were gratified to find they exceeded the amount collected last year.

Taunton (Resignation).—The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, B.A., having intimated his intention of resigning his position as minister of Mary-street Chapel, the congregation at a special general meeting, recently held, resolved that while feeling deep regret at being obliged to accept his resignation, they desired to place on record their deep sense of Mr. Worthington's efforts as a minister, and of his kindness and generosity during the seventeen years of his ministry.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE are grieved to see in the last number of the Christian Register which has reached us a brief announcement of the death of Dr. Charles Carroll Everett, Dean of the Harvard Divinity School, and senior Editor of the New World. Dr. Everett, who was seventy-one years of age, passed away in the night of Tuesday, Oct. 16, at his home at Cambridge, Mass. In this week's Christian World there is also a note concerning Dr. Everett, from which the following is taken :—

Professor Everett has been for some twenty years in the chair which he adorned equally by ripe learning and spiritual character. In his earlier years he had been professor of modern languages in Boudoin College, Maine, and subsequently minister of the Independent Congregational Church at Bangor, Maine. In his professorship of theology he gave full emphasis to the old saying, Pectus facit theologum, and students learned to correct a one-sided intellectualism by recognising the rights of religious feeling. Spiritual values were to him the supreme values. The vacancy created by his death is one not easy to fill.

In the autumn of 1893 Dr. Everett was in this country and took part in the proceedings at the opening of Manchester College, Oxford. We hope to be able to give next week some further account of a life remarkable for its gifts and influence.

THE third of Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was given at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, and in spite of the most unfavourable weather was very well attended. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, of Mansford-street Church and Mission. The subject of the lecture was "The Gospels and the Origin of Christianity," to be followed by two lectures on "The Gospel Question,"—"The Synoptics" next Tuesday, and on Tuesday week "The Fourth Gospel" being dealt with. Mr. Carpenter referred to the attitude of eighteenth-century scholars in Germany towards the Old Testament, and their application of the same methods to the New, and having described the crude rationalism of Paulus, early in the present century, passed on to deal more fully with the more discerning criticism of which Baur and Strauss were the leaders. But it was not enough, he said, to show what different tendencies of religious life had been at work to produce the literature of the New Testament, they must ask what it was produced the Gospel, and in answering this question he described the "Lives" of Jesus, by Ewald, Renan, Strauss, and finally "Ecce Homo," concluding by quoting in contrast the judgment of Lord Shaftesbury and Mr. Gladstone on that remarkable book.

AN event of the utmost importance in the religious history of Scotland took place at Edinburgh on Wednesday, when the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church completed an act of union, and formed a new "United Free Church of Scotland." Of the two bodies thus uniting, the Free Church, which had its origin in the great secession of 1843, under the leadership of Chalmers, is the stronger, having considerably more than a thousand churches throughout Scotland. The United Presbyterian Church was formed in 1847 by the union of the old Secession Church of 1733 and the Relief Church of 1761, having now something under six hundred churches, if our figures are correct. Thus various streams of religious life are now united to form one great Church, by which both the parishes throughout the country, the theological colleges and other institutions, will be immeasurably strengthened.

AN attempt at union was made thirty years ago and failed, but the matter was reopened in 1897, and to Dr. Rainy, Principal of the New College, Edinburgh, the one survivor of those who made the previous attempt, and for many years the leader of the Free Church Assembly, the chief credit of the present happy issue is now generally attributed. In recognition of his commanding influence he was on Wednesday unanimously elected the first Moderator of the General Assembly of the new church. The consent of the U.P.'s to the act of union was unanimous. In the Free Church there was some opposition, and when the final vote was taken in their Assembly the dissentients numbered 27 against 643. The remnant which stands out from the Union will therefore be very small, and is said to be chiefly in distant parishes in the Highlands.

FOR the completion of the Act of Union a great hall had been erected on the open space of Waverley Market, to accommodate some six thousand people. The representatives of the two Churches met early on Wednesday morning at their respective headquarters in Edinburgh, and led by their Moderators, Dr. W. Ross Taylor, of the Free Church, and Dr. Mair, of the United Presbyterians, walked through the streets in procession, two abreast, until the two streams met, and after salutation formed a united procession, led by the two Moderators, and walking four abreast to the hall of meeting. There an immense gathering was awaiting them, among those belonging to other Churches present during the proceedings being Lord Rosebery and Lord Aberdeen, Dr. Fairbairn and Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren), Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, and Dr. Cameron Lees, of the Church of Scotland. The Moderators and other officials took their places in solemn silence, and after prayer Dr. Murray Mitchell, the oldest minister of the Free Church, and one who took part in the disruption of 1843, moved the adoption of the Act of Union. This was seconded by Dr. Henderson, an ex-Moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, and carried, the whole Assembly rising and cheering.

The Moderator of the Free Church then said,—In the presence of our Divine King and Head of the Church, and with the concurrence of the whole Free Church, I declare the act of union finally adopted, and that the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church are now one Church of Christ Jesus, under the designation of the United Free Church of Scotland. Let us praise God by singing a part of the 72nd Psalm.

The lines of the psalm beginning "Now blessed be the Lord our God" were then sung by the vast assemblage.

Dr. Ross Taylor, continuing, said,—I have now the high privilege, in the name of the Free Church of Scotland, to offer you, honoured brother, as Moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, the right hand of fellowship in token of the happy union now formed betwixt the two Churches.

Dr. Mair.—I have equally the high privilege, in the name of the United Presbyterian Church, of offering you, honoured brother, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, the right hand of fellowship in token of the union now happily consummated between our Churches.

Dr. Ross Taylor.—And may the Three in One, God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, richly bless the United Free Church of Scotland.

Dr. Mair.—And make it a blessing to Scotland and the world and a glory to our Lord and King. Amen.

Dr. Taylor.—Amen.

THE Act of Union was then signed by the Moderators of the two Churches amid loud and prolonged cheers. On the motion of Dr. Mair, seconded by Lord Overtoun, Dr. Rainy was unanimously elected Moderator of the first General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, and being ushered into the hall was greeted by Dr. Ross Taylor, and was received with great acclamation. The new Moderator then delivered his address, in the course of which he said:—

Into both of the Churches now united there flowed together various streams of Scottish church life, each, with whatever failings, exhibiting a history of notable fidelity, patience, and sacrifice, and each maintaining substantially the same ideal of the Divine life in human souls. All of them had found, sooner or later, that the truths they cherished and the ends they sought could be better served by enlarged fellowship than by solicitous separation. So they came together. Out of this union would come, he trusted, in the end, though he did not know how it was to come, a larger Presbyterianism for Scotland, devoted to the advancement of Our Lord's Kingdom, very friendly, he hoped, to the civil authority, very serviceable to the welfare of the nation, but free from temptations and the risks of a statutory connection with the State.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings the Earl of Aberdeen, who is an Elder of the Church of Scotland, being called upon, referred to another union he had witnessed, of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and as to the proceedings of that day, said he rejoiced in that great step to union, for he was one of those who hoped that there was still a better time to come.

THE death is announced of the venerable Frédéric Godet, a distinguished Swiss theologian, and leader of an Evangelical secession from the National Church. Dr. Godet passed peacefully away in his home at Neuchâtel on Monday morning, at the age of eighty-eight. Born at Neuchâtel in 1812 he studied at Berlin and Bonn, being a pupil of Hengstenberg, Tholuck and Neander. He was ordained in 1836, but then became for some years tutor to Prince Frederick William of Prussia, afterwards the Emperor Frederick. In 1844 he entered on pastoral work in his native town, and six years later was elected Professor of Theology and New Testament Exegesis and Criticism in the Neuchâtel Theological College. He was the author of well-known commentaries on the Gospels of Luke and John, and on the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. He was still engaged on an "Introduction to the New Testament" at the time of his death.

ON Thursday of last week, Oct. 25, being the received date of the death of Chaucer, five hundred years ago, a memorial window to the poet was unveiled in St. Saviour's Church, Southwark, which is near the site of that old inn from which the Pilgrims started on their journey to the shrine of St. Thomas, as Chaucer records in his prologue to his "Canterbury Tales." The window itself is not specially remarkable. It is a plain lancet in the north aisle of the nave, opposite the more elaborate window which commemorates Shakespeare and Spenser, and next to the tomb of Chaucer's contemporary, Gower. On the other side of the tomb is a window in memory of Bunyan, and another is reserved for Richard Baxter, but has not yet been given. The Chaucer window, which is a private gift, and commemorates at the same time a private sorrow, shows a portrait of the poet in the upper section, but more prominently below a full-length figure of St. Thomas of Canterbury, while between is a representation of the pilgrims starting on the road. The authorities of the British Museum have also marked the five-hundredth anniversary of the poet's death by an interesting exhibition in the King's Library of Chaucer MSS. and books. There are several fifteenth-century MSS. of the "Canterbury Tales" and other of Chaucer's works, and the printed editions have an added interest as beginning with Caxton's first edition of the "Tales," printed in 1478, the year after he set up his press at Westminster, and therefore one of the first English books to be printed. The series includes also Furnivall's Six Text edition, printed in 1868 for the Chaucer Society, and the magnificent Kelmscott edition of 1896, illustrated by Burne-Jones, and decorated and printed by William Morris. Even those who know little else of Chaucer and his delightful "Tales," and only vaguely honour him as first in the great line of English poets, whose language is our own, should take some trouble to be familiar with the company of his pilgrims, and especially with his poor parson and his Oxford scholar:—

A Clerk ther was of Oxenford also,
That unto logik haddë longe i-go.
As lenë was his hors as is a rake,
And he was not right fat, I undertake;

. . . . .

Sownynge in moral vertu was his speche,
And gladly wolde lerne, and gladly teche.

A good man was there of religioun,
And was a pourë Persoun of a toun;
But riche he was of holy thought and werk,
He was also a lerned man, a clerk
That Cristes gospel trewely woldë preche;
His parischens devoutly wolde he teche.
Benigne he was, and wonder diligent,
And in adversite ful pacient;

. . . . .

A bettre preest, I trowe, ther nowher non is.
He waytede after no pompe and reverence,
Ne makede him a spiced conscience,
But Cristes lore, and his apostles twelve
He taughte, but first he folwede it himselve.

WE quoted recently from the letters of Dr. Martineau to Mr. B. B. Wiley, of Chicago, printed in this month's Atlantic Monthly, and now add the following further passages from the correspondence:—In March, 1883, Dr. Martineau wrote hoping that his friend had come across Mr. Thom's "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," then recently published, "a book belonging to the very highest rank of religious literature, and, in my judgment, as much superior to all that this age has produced of that kind as the Gospel is superior to the Law. For depth of moral insight, tenderness of affection, purity of devotion, and just courage of rebuke to wrong and sin, with delicate freedom from exaggeration and from one-sided sympathy, it seems to me to stand alone. And it is as graceful and charming in form as it is rare and rich in its contents. For years I have been pressing him to publish, and at last we have prevailed against his modest reluctance." And in the following January he wrote: "I felt sure from the first that Mr. Thom's volume, 'The Laws of Life,' would find a just appreciation with the best part of your reading public; and the longer it is known, the higher will be its place. To me it seems almost a unique book in religious literature, and one which opens precisely the view of thought and affection most needed to develop the best possibilities and evade the greatest dangers of character in our age."

IN the last letter, dated Oct. 18, 1892, from The Polchar, Aviemore, Dr. Martineau tells of his great interest in revisiting Dublin, where he had been on occasion of the Tercentenary of the University, to receive the honorary degree of Litt.D., after an interval of sixty years from the time of his residence there. He then goes on to another subject:—

As Commissioner for the British section of your World's Fair in its department of philanthropic work, and more especially women's work, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts applied to me for information respecting English Unitarian institutions and labours under these heads. The very inquiry is a satire upon our intensely sectarian life; assuming as it does that all our charities are done denominationally; and that to survey them all without counting any twice over, you must find an enumerator for every kind of Church, and add up all the lists delivered in. I could only reply that it was the inherited and personal habit of our people to look on the social compassions and Christian sympathies which give birth to hospitals, schools, reformatories, rescue missions, and every form of philanthropic effort, as of universal obligation, civic and human: we never thought of going apart and setting up for ourselves, as an exclusive theological party, spheres of action equally open and equally congenial to the conscience and affections of others. On the contrary, we worked with our fellow-citizens, irrespective of creed, wherever we could; and did nothing alone, except where we must. The result of this catholicity necessarily is that, while our fellow-worshippers contribute probably their fair proportion of labour, thought and revenue to the philanthropic total of English life, we have little to show in the way of sect benevolences, and should be wrongfully judged by their statistics. And so of women's work. With small exception, there is no difference between men and women in the incidence of charitable duty; and joint action in it is, in our opinion, essential to its best spirit and efficiency. On these grounds I declined to act as reporter for the Unitarian beneficences.

In the concluding paragraph of this last letter of the correspondence Dr. Martineau said: "The year is closing solemnly upon us. Your beloved Whittier has left the world whose sins he so boldly rebuked, and whose sorrows he so sweetly soothed. And now our noble Tennyson has taken his wealth of soul away from us; and no one remains who can tell us how its pathetic griefs and doubts and faith have risen into a majestic joy."

WE referred recently to a reproduction in the October Bookman of a drawing of Dr. Martineau by Mrs. Basil Martineau, which was exhibited in this year's Academy. RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

V.

THE third and concluding article on the Church of England by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, we are obliged to hold over until next week.

THE CHURCH OF THE SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY.*

III.

"When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth."—John xvi. 13.

WHAT, then, we go on to ask, are the marks of this Church of the Spirit, and what are the special duties of those who shall enter its communion? The Church of the Spirit, one must answer, is first of all a living church; and a living church, like all other living things, is marked by growth, progress, change. Fixity is not a sign of life and power, but of sterility and death. "There is nothing so destructive," said Thomas Arnold, "because so contrary to nature, as the strain to keep things fixed"; and, as one looks across the Christian world to-day, and sees the intensity of this strain to keep things fixed, he is moved, not by a sense of satisfaction that the strain is to snap, but by the pathos of this destructive and hopeless demand for fixity. The truth is ever revealing new aspects of itself: the truth that can move the heart must itself be a moving truth. "If God shall reveal anything to you," said John Robinson, "by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive anything by my ministry; for I am confident that God has more truth yet to break out of his holy word." What is this but a repetition of the Master's promise that, when he had gone away, the Spirit of the truth would come and lead men into all truth? And does not this teach us why Jesus dared to give the Spirit of the truth that other and surprising name, the Comforter? What a strange word is this—that the Spirit of the truth is a comforter! How uncomforting, how uncomfortable the truth often seems! How many a devout soul, how many a Christian communion, has dreaded to go on into the unknown truth, lest the truth, as it should be given, should bring no comfort! Yet this is the witness of all deep experiences of life—that the only substantial comfort to a soul or to a church is in perfect loyalty to the truth as it is given. The only comforting revelation is a progressive revelation. What comfort can it be to build one's faith on a foundation which any day may slip from beneath one's feet, to wake some morning and find that a new Biblical discovery has robbed us of our evidence of God! Stability for a church, as for a planet, is in its motion. The Church of the Spirit is a church of hope.

Again, the Church of the Spirit is a religious church. Exaggerated as it would be to speak of an irreligious church, who can deny that a great part of the energy of religious organisations is given to matters that are not religious, to the perfecting of machinery instead of the communicating of power? No church, it is true, can be delivered from the care of mechanism, no power can be utilised without machinery. Yet the aim of all well-directed skill, in the Church as in the world of industry, is to transmit the power at one's command with the least possible obstruction or loss; and the chief source of waste of power, in a church as in a factory, is in the hindering of its energy or in diverting it from its proper work. We look, once more, at the issues which consume the sessions of ecclesiastical councils; we look, indeed, at the methods we are ourselves tempted to employ as substitutes for the religious life; and how far away seems the Church of the Spirit! "What conclusions these controversies may come to," lately said a brave leader in a sorely embarrassed church, "is of no consequence: the only important thing is that they shall come to an end." And what shall bring to an end this waste of power, and make the Church of Christ a clear channel for the energy of God? It is a renewal of confidence in the witness of the Holy Spirit, a trust like that of Jesus in the Spirit of the truth. What the Church needs in its preaching and in its working is not more mechanism, or organisation, or external re-enforcement, but more confidence in its message, more consecration, more spirituality, more faith. The prayer of the present time should not be, "Lord, increase our congregations, our statistics, our income," but, "Lord, increase our faith." The Church of the Spirit is a church of faith.

Once more the Church of the Spirit is a ministering Church. By the grace of God we have come to a time when the chief interest of the world is outward-looking, generous, self-forgetting. It is the age of the social question; and the test of the Church, as of all other human organisations, must be found in its contribution to social service. But how slightly we are aware that effectiveness in social service does not proceed from the arrangements of reform! Behind all the social mechanism in which we may enlist there is a social dynamic to be secured; and the fundamental need of an age of social service is not so much for more channels of social usefulness as for more social wisdom, insight, patience and power. And from what source does this power of philanthropy proceed? It springs from the hidden sense of God, from the life of idealism, insight, vision, and faith, as the full stream which moves the modern industry flows from its secret source among the quiet hills. No graver mistake could be made than to fancy that the outward-looking activity of the present age is a detachment of its interest from religion. It is, on the contrary, a witness of religion, as the volume of the stream testifies to the abundance of its springs. Without a supply of social idealism the stream of social service soon runs dry.

Seventy years ago in the city of Boston there occurred a renaissance of practical philanthropy, which still gives to the city a leadership in social service. From one small group of closely associated friends there proceeded in those days the first illustration in this country of scientific charity through the work of Tuckerman, the first care of the blind and feeble-minded in the work of Dr. Howe, the first intelligent care of the insane in the work of Dorothea Dix. But whence came the spiritual power which poured itself through these channels? It came from a person who was neither a reformer nor agitator nor practical leader, but a preacher, a thinker, a seer. Dr. Tuckerman was a lifelong intimate of William Ellery Channing. Dr. Howe was within the inner circle of his friendship. Miss Dix was one of his own household. The new philanthropy was the witness of a new religious force. Behind its wisdom and devotion lay a new faith in the worth of the human soul. Was this an unusual relationship in the history of social reform? On the contrary, it is illustrated by each transition in the history of social progress. Behind the liberty of Florence stood the prophecy of Savonarola; behind the Innere Mission of Germany was the piety of Francke and of Wichern; behind the social movement of the Church of England was the philosophy of Maurice; behind the new philanthropy of Boston the inspiration of the gospel of Christ through the preaching of Phillips Brooks. Thus it always has been; and, if in any congregation to-day one observes a new stirring of healthy-minded social service, he may be sure that back of the sense of the human need there is a personal source of faith and courage, like a throbbing engine communicating spiritual power. More than all, and behind all, is the new birth of philanthropy which proceeded from Christianity itself. It was an epoch hardly less marked in its thought of man than in its thought of God. The "Caritas" of the Christians had a scope and quality which the "Prodigalitas" of the Roman world never knew. Yet more extraordinary than Christian philanthropy itself was the origin of this new love of man. Jesus was not a reformer or organiser or social agitator; he was a prophet, a revealer, a mystic, a seer. Yet from his vision of the love of God issued the new summons to the service of man. "For their sakes," said Jesus, in perhaps his greatest statement of his mission, "I sanctify myself." "For their sakes,"—that is the end toward which the Christian life proceeds, the end of generous service. "I sanctify myself,"—that is the beginning from which the Christian life proceeds, the dynamic of personal consecration. The disciple of Jesus Christ sanctifies himself for others' sakes. The Church of the Spirit is a church of love.

And what then, finally, is this living, praying, ministering Church—this Church of hope and faith and love? What is it but organised religion as Jesus desired that it should live and do its work? With what a mighty hope he viewed the movement of the world, white as he saw it for his harvest, safe as he felt it to be in the guidance of the Spirit of the truth! With what a supporting faith he turned from all other ways of power, and trusted the dynamic of holiness! With what an individualised love he gave himself to the life of service, not to be ministered unto, but to minister! Jesus was the most unfaltering of mystics. His spirit dwelt in habitual and unhindered communion with the Spirit of the truth. "I and my Father," he said, "are one." But it was not the sickly mysticism of self-centred meditation: it was the healthy mysticism which utters itself in self-effacing love. "Jesus Christ," says the book of Acts, "went about doing good," God having "anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power." It was the power of the Holy Ghost which made him able to do good. The Church of the ministering Spirit is the Church of Jesus Christ.

And we, who have our humble part in the inheritance of this lineage of the Spirit; we, for whom the way of direct communion with God has been swept clean of obstruction; we, to whom the language of the devout life in all the ages is a not unfamiliar tongue; we, who instead of purchasing with a great price this freedom are free-born members of the church of the Spirit—what pledge have we to make to-night but of a better loyalty to the Church that moves and prays and ministers—the Church of hope and faith and love? How slight has been our service, how imperfect our attachment to this supreme vocation! How preoccupied have been our minds with mechanism, and how low has run our stream of power! Yet how plain it is that all the forces of spiritual vitality in the present time conspire to direct us where we ought to go! The noise of controversy and the discord of dissent are hushed when the Spirit of truth, the Comforter, comes. The revolving eddies of the age are helpless to detain a Church, when it feels beneath its life the main current of the life of the Spirit. The future welcomes the Church of the Spirit, as a strong breeze comes up out of the sea and swells the sails that have been long becalmed; and the Church which gives itself to that persuasion of the Spirit, coming as the wind comes, viewless, but full of power, is borne on like a vessel that heads at last upon her proper course. The restlessness of her crew is still as they hasten to their new obedience; and they sing together as they trim their sails—

Why labour at the dull mechanic oar,
When the fresh breeze is blowing,
And the swift current flowing,
Right onward to the eternal shore?

THE OLD AND THE NEW.*

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

"Ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new."—Lev. xxvi. 10.

AMONG the crowd of thoughts suggested by the glorious days of harvest, there is one in the background which we might bring to the front with a good deal of profit—namely, the inexhaustible plenty and ever-continued fruitfulness of the earth. Did you ever consider how all man's wealth comes out of the earth, how God's great gift to man which includes all others for the outward life is the earth, how the earth is humanity's cruse of oil which is never dry and barrel of meal which is never empty? And we need not wait for harvest to have this borne in upon us. If we have the open eye, the busy street will serve our purpose almost as well as cornfields and orchards, the granary and the mill. Dr. Johnson, no great lover of the country, when asked to take a walk, replied: "A walk? there is no walk like that down Fleet-street." Well, Fleet-street will suit us admirably, or any other street where there are shops, trades, and factories. What are all these shops filled with? The two cardinal wants of human beings—food and raiment. Food in its plainer or daintier forms; raiment of endless colour, texture, use and ornament. All the familiar things of man's life come out of the earth, not only corn and wine and oil, but iron, copper, jewels, gold and silver, the fire in our grates, the pigments and canvas of the artist, the violin of the musician, the soldier's rifle, all noble buildings, trains and steamships, all finally have the earth for their mother. The earth it is which feeds the people, clothes the people, adorns the people, employs their labour, calls forth their skill, gives them all their wealth. All this the earth has been doing ever since man first appeared upon it. We have taken out of the bosom of the earth, for thousands of generations, countless treasures, and still the earth is full of bounty and pours of her abundance into our laps. How many harvests have been reaped, and yet the earth never yielded so much to man's labour as she does to-day. Harvest treads hard upon the heels of harvest. The earth is scarcely stripped of corn and fruit before it bursts again into leaf and bud.

This is the thought of our text: "Ye shall eat of the old store, and carry forth the old from your barns to make place for the new." It is a picturesque way of saying that before the stores of one harvest are exhausted another shall have given its fruit. All through the winter, spring, and summer the granaries shall yield supplies. And when the new wheat comes there will still be some of the old in store, and men will have to bring it forth, to empty their barns that room may be found for the fresh supplies which the blessing of God has sent. The same idea of superabundant yield is given under another form in verse 5: "Your threshing shall reach into vintage, and vintage shall reach unto the sowing time, and ye shall eat your bread to the full." One is at once reminded of the striking words of Amos: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, when the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth the seed." The harvest of corn is hardly finished before the harvest of grapes begins, the grapes are scarcely pressed in the vat before the olives are ready. One blessing follows another with unbroken continuity; harvest succeeds harvest so rapidly that the remains of one have to be brought out to make room for the next.

It is no dull analogy which makes us see in the seasons of Nature images of human life. It is no mere dream of the poet that the external world is fitted to the mind. Cloud and sunshine, seed-time and harvest, the stages of growth, the shepherd's care, the loveliness of the lilies, the falling sparrow—all these are, that they may furnish the soul of man with pictures and parables by which to set forth and speak of the inner life.

The outward form is not the whole,
But clearly has been moulded
To image forth an inward soul
That dimly is unfolded.

So we apply the phenomena of harvest to the higher region of our spiritual experience. For my purpose to-day I take the hint and the suggestion I find in our text, "Ye shall eat the old store and bring forth the old because of the new," as indicating our duty towards new occasions, new ideas, new duties, new conceptions of truth and life. We have sometimes to bring forth what remains of the old that we may receive the new. And it is not always easy or pleasant to accept the change. Men and churches, communities and institutions naturally cherish the old and part from it with reluctance. But when a new harvest is at the door the old must be brought forth and set aside, with thankfulness, indeed, that it did so much for us, but also with joy that fresh stores are adding to our wealth.

We all get endeared to the old—old employments, old habits, old opinions, old creeds, old social conceptions; old things become very precious to us just because we are so familiar with them, and because in other days they nourished our life. But things which have had their day must now give place to newer thoughts and newer ideals, and the new ways of an advancing age, and another set of conditions. In their day these old things were good; we lived by them, we ate of their store; but a new harvest waits for us, and we must bring forth the remnants of the old that are beginning to be stale and musty.

How many a man finds by painful experience, by loss or decay of trade, that the old methods of doing business which once sufficed are now out of date. The manufacturer must bring forth his old machinery and sell it for scrap iron that new inventions may take its place; the merchant must discard many an old tradition that he may adapt his business to the new age.

There are new social ideals which compel men to bring forth and put aside those which prevailed in their youth; there are new relations of classes, new conceptions of the place of employers and employed, new notions of the rights of children. Everybody can see, however much many may deplore it, that the old attitude of parent to child and of child to parent is rapidly passing away. Much of the old authority on the one hand, much of the old deference on the other, have disappeared from family life. It is a change which, no doubt, has its perils, yet on the whole it leads to freer, healthier, manlier life. But how reluctant men are to acknowledge it. You remember how the father of Elizabeth Barrett forbade her marriage with Robert Browning, and how, when it was accomplished without his leave, he shut his door upon his daughter, and never spoke to her, wrote to her, or saw her again. He could not see that she had a right to her own life and to live it in her own fashion—that she was an independent being. His family revolved around him; all must be subject to his will and consult his convenience. His daughter was his own private personal property. That is an extreme instance, it is true, but it represents a class of men who cannot recognise the great change which has come over family life, and who cling to the old conceptions when new ones are at the door.

So it has been and will be with the history of religious thought in the record of man's spiritual progress.

What a substitution of the new for the old was there at the coming of Christ. The old narrow customs of Judaism gave way to the new principles of Christianity, the old rules of conduct to new ideals of character, the old local worship of God and the old idea of a special sanctity in the Jerusalem temple to the broader conception of a God everywhere to be found, everywhere to be worshipped, and of every place as hallowed ground.

* A sermon preached in Upper Chapel, Sheffield, on Thursday, Oct. 18, in commemoration of the Bicentenary of the Chapel.

Or what a substitution of the new for the old was there at the Protestant Reformation. The old authority of the Church gave way to the new authority of the Bible, the old priestly guidance to the new idea of private judgment and individual responsibility.

Judaism had been a harvest which fed the spiritual life of the world for ages. But at last it gave way to something better. Romanism had filled the barns and supplied man's ethical and religious wants in many lands. But then came a new light and a new truth, like a fresh harvest.

Think you that there is no more to learn, no more to unlearn, or that the Reformation was God's final word about Religion? Think you that there is no new light to receive, no old lamps to discard for new, no new harvest for the necessities of a new world?

For it is a new world in which we live. In a measure, of which few of us dream, "Old things have passed away, all things have become new." It is not only that we have new means of locomotion, new methods of business and new processes of trade. Nor is it only that we have new populations thronging around us, new notions of political rights and duties; that science has founded a new empire; that the world is full of a new wonder; and that society is instinct with new ideas and thrilling with a new vitality. The change which marks our time is far more radical than the ordinary expansive and progressive movement which follows the advent of each young generation. There is a sense in which all things pass away and many things become new as each phalanx of the human army passes forth into the world. The young age is always revolutionary. Society is always casting its skin, with more or less of sickness and sadness. Nevertheless it comes forth in due time with fresh vigour and a braver dress. But the great changes of the nineteenth century are far more revolutionary than the world has known since the introduction of Christianity. Mr. Balfour, in his address on "The Nineteenth Century," delivered before the University of Cambridge, tells us that "No century has ever seen so great a change in our intellectual apprehension of the world." He asks us to construct an imaginary conversation between a man of science who lived a century ago and one who lived two centuries ago—say, between Priestley, who died in 1804, and Hooke, who died in 1703. We should find that the speakers met on equal terms. Nothing had happened during the hundred years that separated them to make their language strange to each other. But imagine Priestley brought to life and holding a conversation with some modern man of science, and a very different state of things would present itself. Their ideas, their philosophy, their very language would be different.

It is not simply [says Mr. Balfour] that this century has witnessed a prodigious and unexampled growth in our stock of knowledge, for new knowledge might accumulate without end, and yet do no more than fill in, without materially changing, the outlines already traced by the old. Something much more important than this has happened. Our whole point of view has altered. The mental framework in which we arrange the separate facts in the world of men and things is a new framework. We not only see more, we see differently. It is not too much to say that for us, in the year 1900, the world considered as a pageant, slowly unrolling itself through the ages, is a wholly different world from that which presented itself to the imagination of our forefathers 100 years ago. I am not sure that it would be too much to say that in this particular we differ more from them than they differed from the Babylonians.

It was not to be expected that the Churches and theology would escape the revolutionary changes of our times. They also have come up for judgment and revision. The new science, the new criticism, the new methods of interpretation, the new uprising of Democracy, the new sense of Humanity, have conspired to put the old creeds into the melting pot, and to give religion a new and more adequate expression. We say this without any disparagement of the old. The old was once the new; men were nourished by it as by an abundant harvest; it bred stalwart souls, men of bone and sinew; but now God speaks to us in another of His "divers-ways," and brings a new harvest to our doors.

But, alas! men often go on clinging to old things after they have become musty by long lying in the granary, and when room is wanted for the new fruit gathered in from the fields of God. There is many an old doctrine of theology, many an old tradition of the Church, which is no longer fragrant and life-giving, but is fit only to be cast out of the minds of men and the structure of the Church. The Church is called to sweep out the remains of much that is old, the poor remnants of old time harvests, in order to take in the new blessings, the fuller knowledge, the larger science, the finer social obligations of our day! What is this folly which fetters the Church of God with the archaic formularies, confessions, and articles of the past? I am amazed at the way in which men and churches are sweeping in the corners and bins of the barn for seeds and relics from the past—always going back for their ideas of doctrine, of religion, of church life and the conduct of worship—back, some of them, to the sixteenth century, and some to the fourth, and some to the apostolic age. How musty are many of these old things on which men were once nourished—auricular confession, priestly pretensions, sacerdotal claims, the virtues of incense! How musty are many of the doctrines of the Reformation, the infallibility of the Bible, substitutionary atonement, eternal torment, a material hell, total depravity, election! Men are afraid of the light which shines to-day. The present terrifies them. Back they go to the past. One thinks he can find in Luther the perfect and final theology; another swears by Tertullian; another is anxious to know whether Paul was a Trinitarian or a Unitarian. Surely such anxious retrospection would not be thought a healthy symptom in any other sphere of life! Life looks onward, not backward, and the man does not pride himself exactly on being the same as the boy. An institution is healthy not as it lives on its past, or tries to reproduce the glories of other days, but in proportion to the confident freedom with which it adapts itself to meet new conditions. The old is brought forth that place may be found for the new. We mourn over our failures, and God knows they are many and sad. And we think we can mend them by going back to old orthodoxies. We remember the once glowing vitality of our churches, and compare it with their present conditions, wondering how we can bring back the successes of the past. Brothers, we never can bring back past successes. It is in appreciation of the new time with its new needs that we must lay our plans. "Wilt thou not at this time restore the kingdom again to Israel?" said the apostles, still with their gaze riveted on what the kingdom had been in the olden time. It was a wistful, pathetic prayer. But it could not be. The disciples, failing to understand the new time and the new principles by which to mould it for God, hoped for some revival of the glories of Elijah and David. "Wilt thou not restore again the kingdom to Israel?" It was a prayer unfulfilled in the way they expected, but in a nobler way, and in a way they had not conceived, gloriously fulfilled. For that most amazing kingdom, which was not, indeed, restored to Israel, but opened and made free to all the world, was slowly established by the labours of these very men when once it dawned upon them that the past could never be restored. And the kingdom founded by them, and which was not at all what at first they had looked for, was grander far, more glorious in its sway and power than any restoration, such as they pictured, of the old Israelite throne. It was a larger, deeper task to which they were called than any restoration—to shape a new world, to bring in a new heaven and a new earth.

Oh, what failures they met with, what checks and disappointments, what losses and sorrows! The new kingdom did not start up in a night like some magical palace. Things did not prosper easily. At times there was no progress at all, but only decline and defeat. We see these men toiling as we toil, doubting as we doubt, jarring as we jar; struggling, beaten, baffled, yet still labouring, still carried through, still moving on. The new truth did not swiftly make its way. It was preached by men who were hungry, and sick, and tired. It is our own experience. We are sore and disappointed at the slow growth of ideas; we are dismayed before the seeming waste of effort. The new truth is so long in taking hold. To us it is so obvious, so gracious, so transparent. A nobler thought of God is sown broadcast by the prophets, by a Robertson, or a Parker, or a Maurice, or a Tennyson, or a Martineau, and surely we think the harvest will soon appear in the whole land-rejoicing because of the new light and the brighter sunshine. Oh! the dreary mishaps that overtake the good hope, the failures, the bitter disappointments. Surely it were easier to restore the kingdom again to Israel than to bring this new thing to birth!

Brethren, you are elebrating to-day, with joy and gratitude, the two-hundredth anniversary of your church. From far and near friends gather to join in your rejoicing, to greet you with congratulations, to sympathise in your festival. This church, born in stormy and troublous times, has a history of which you may well be proud. Founded by strong and faithful souls long since passed away from earth, it has borne throughout its long history witness to intellectual freedom, to religious liberty and to the saving things of grace and character, looking only in its members for the inspiration of personal piety. Here the timid have learned to be brave, here the weak have been made strong, here men gave a welcome and a home to the new truth which knocked at their door, and here the same cry has sounded in the ears of succeeding generations, "Sursum corda." May the God of the fathers be the God of the children. To-day your minds are filled with thoughts of the past—faces of dear ones whom you have "loved long since and lost awhile" gleam out upon you from these walls where they worshipped; memories of saintly souls are in your hearts; voices of past generations mingle in your song of praise. You do well to keep holy-day with music and mirth. But there is a new harvest in the field, a new time at your doors, a new world, which your fathers knew not, with new needs and new ideals, waiting for your ministry. Even churches like this are apt to be content with the old ways, the old traditions, the old controversies, the old conceptions of church life and effort—the stale remnants of other harvests. You also are called to bring forth the old and find place for the new. It is not unknown that our Free Churches also are sometimes given to scraping in the corners of the barn and at the bottom of the bin for a few musty seeds left over from ancient harvests. There are those among us who fail to realise that the doctrinal controversies which seemed at one time to give our churches their raison d'être are now nearly all past issues. Even the Trinitarian discussion, once so active, is a pale ghost of its former self. The stream of thought and inquiry has swept by the things that were vital half-a-century ago, and left them high and dry on the bank. We are face to face with other problems, and problems of far greater importance. It is no longer the doctrinal aspect of Christianity which is in question, but its relation to the social ideas of our day. Christianity has broken out of the old bounds of doctrine. Our Church did a noble work in simplifying and purifying the dogmas of the Church, in getting a way for a larger tolerance, in emphasising the truth that saving faith is not faith in opinion and creeds but fidelity to love and righteousness, and to the ideal of life all men see in Jesus. But new times require a new ministry. We see on every hand a wonderful thing—namely, the strenuous attempt to apply the teaching of Jesus to the problems of social welfare. Whether it be Mr. Fiske and Henry George in America, or Tolstoy in Russia, or Ruskin and William Morris in England, or Victor Hugo in France, or even such a poor creature as Marie Corelli, all have formally essayed to bring the spirit, the character, and the ideas of Jesus into touch with the actualities of life. I know that the work of Biblical criticism and doctrinal reconstruction must go on—but the new harvest waiting to be gathered in is mainly in other directions. Our strength will not be, as in the past, in our doctrinal protest. "Lord, wilt thou not at this time restore the kingdom again to Israel?" No, it cannot be. The old answered a noble purpose, but a new kingdom is before us. The many chaptered story of the human struggle for good takes on another form in the twentieth century, and it is for our churches to rise to the level of the new ideals and conditions, mingling the temper of seriousness and Christ-like sympathy with the passionate hopes of the new age for a fairer social justice. In all Christian churches, but especially in our own, the ear catches the vibrations of change and a new birth. The task of adapting Christianity not only to the new intellectual life but also to the new conceptions of social obligation is laid upon us. The world is instinct with a new interest in, a new sense of responsibility towards, our brother man. It is ours to show that in the Sufferer of Calvary there is set forever before the wondering eyes of men a type of brotherhood far more beautiful than all their dreams. The greatest epoch in the world's history since the coming of Christ is about us. New forces which for years have been swelling through innumerable channels are bursting forth for the re-fertilisation of human life and thought. New conceptions of the functions of government, new relations of the State to the individual, the idea of a community, a city, a state, as an organic whole, a real unit, a genuine being with its own character and powers, its own capacities and responsibilities—these are the waters which are flooding all lands. Or to go back to the figure of our text, this is the new store we must gather into our barns. To claim this harvest of ideas, hopes and efforts for Christ, to leaven it with the Master's spirit, to give it expression in the life of the Church, to welcome the new social aspiration after a larger and profounder brotherhood of men, to teach men to realise the greater responsibilities and the finer ethical splendours of the new social conception—this is our mission, and for this we are called upon to bring out the remnants of old harvests that we may find room for the new. These historic churches of ours are face to face with a new world. What then?

Do not crouch to-day and worship
The old Past, whose life is fled;
Hush your voice in tender reverence,
Crowned he lies, but cold and dead.

For the Present reigns our monarch,
With an added weight of hours;
Honour her, for she is mighty,
Honour her, for she is ours.

Noble things the great Past promised,
Holy dreams, both strange and new;
But the Present shall fulfil them—
What he promised, she shall do.

OBITUARY.

MR. HENRY J. M'CANCE, D.L.

THE congregation of the First Presbyterian Church, Dunmurry, have suffered a great loss in the death on Wednesday, Oct. 24, after a lingering illness, of Mr. H. J. M'Cance, who had been a devoted member from the days of Dr. Montgomery's ministry to the present time. Born at Dunmurry, May 23, 1829, the youngest son of the late John M'Cance, formerly member for Belfast, Henry Jones M'Cance entered in 1845 into the linen business in Belfast, and remained actively engaged in this and similar pursuits until 1868, when he became a director of the Ulster Banking Company. For some years he served on the Belfast Harbour Board, and held many offices of trust, including that of Deputy-Lieutenant for county Antrim and for the county and borough of Belfast. A few years ago he was High Sheriff of his native county. A Liberal of the old school, he became at the time of the great division a Unionist. He was one of the original members of the Ulster Reform Club, and in 1897 was president. Holding high rank in the commercial world and in public esteem, Mr. M'Cance was honoured not only as a conscientious and public-spirited citizen, but as a man of true benevolence and liberality, the sympathetic friend of many philanthropic undertakings.

The funeral service last Saturday was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, the grave being in the burying ground of Drumbeg Church, and on the following Sunday morning Mr. Kelly preached a memorial sermon at Dunmurry, in which he spoke with much feeling of Mr. M'Cance as one of Nature's noblemen and a life-long member of that congregation, and then proceeded as follows:—

"His simple, unquestioning faith found a congenial home here, and, while liberal in his help of other Christian denominations, yet this worshipping society occupied the first place in his affections. In a naturally good heart dwelt a faith having its roots embedded in the doctrine of the fatherhood of God, the leadership of Christ, the brotherhood of man, and the immortality of the soul. He was a cordial supporter of this and kindred congregations which proclaim a full and open acknowledgment of allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church, and which also stand for the maintenance of the great principles of the Reformation—namely, the sufficiency of the Scripture, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority on matters of faith. And you will find that is not a bad ground for a Church to occupy at this present moment, with growing sacerdotalism on the one hand and scepticism on the other, and a sorry day it will be for our land when those principles are forgotten. Mr. M'Cance held a number of offices in the Synod and Association to which this congregation belongs, being a trustee of the Sustentation Fund of the former body, and hon. treasurer of the Orphan Fund of the latter from the time of its inception till his death, and no more sympathetic orphan treasurer could possibly be found. The fatherless, the widow, and those needing a friend never appealed to him in vain; and how many were helped by him before they were forced to appeal! Not only here, but in every walk of life, how many sadly mourn his departure!"

"The innate goodness of our friend's heart made it a delightful thing to be associated with him in any work, and the power which he acquired, through life-long habit of thought for others, of putting himself in another's place, made him the friend not only of those in his own rank in life, but of persons in every rank. He had a word for all sorts and conditions of men and women, and it was his joy to be amongst young people and children. He had the facility for entering not only into the sorrows of his fellows, but, what is more difficult still, of rejoicing with unqualified zest in the good fortune of his acquaintances. And one other message from him and I have done. What is that message? 'Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another.' To part with one whose name has become a synonym for all that is kindly, generous, unselfish, humble and Christian, is no easy task, but it lieth on us to thank God for His great goodness in having given him for so many years to us; and surely we are called upon to close up our ranks, to redouble our zeal and earnestness, in order to make up in some measure for his departure, and, while we pray God to give the world more good gifts like to the one He has just taken away, yet we may be pardoned if we in our inner hearts believe that we shall not soon look upon his like again."

Mr. Kelly ended by reading Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar," and at the conclusion of the service the "Dead March" in Saul was played.

MRS. ELIZABETH DAVIES.

In the death of Mrs. Davies, the Church of Divine Unity, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, has lost one of its most loyal members, and our Household of Faith is bereaved of a most earnest and faithful supporter of the Unitarian cause. Her unwavering conviction of the goodness of God and the hope of eternal life sustained her in her duties, consoled her in her great sufferings, and enabled her to face death without one thought of fear. Her empty place in the family pew will touch our hearts with sadness; but we who shared her friendship will never cease to be thankful for the years during which we were privileged to know and love her. Outside the circle of her Church, Mrs. Davies was esteemed for the active interest she took in philanthropic enterprises; especially do the Gateshead Children's Hospital and the Mission to the Blind owe much to her wise supervision and generous support. But it was as wife and mother in her beautiful home at Park View that she most of all won our hearts. She was a perfect hostess, her kindly welcome making the visitor feel at once at home, whether he were some distinguished guest or a young student on a visit to supply our pulpit. Many of our ministers will remember with affection the days they spent with us when they enjoyed the gracious hospitality always extended to them in her household. On Sunday morning, Oct. 28, the Rev. Frank Walters preached on "The Victory over Death," and at the close of the sermon, made reference to the death of this devoted member of his church.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

For the Very Little Ones: About Cats.

I hope, children, that you all love animals and are kind and good to them; but I often see boys very unkind to cats—setting dogs to bark at them and chase them, or throwing stones at them—and I feel very sorry for the poor little creatures, who are in terror at ill-treatment. And only see, if they are kindly treated, what charming little friends and companions they are, and how trustfully they look at you with their beautiful eyes, and purr a grateful and happy little song to you.

One day when I was going by the Underground Railway I had to wait for a train at Gower-street Station. There was a dingy-looking room under the stairs, and the door stood open, and out of this room on to the platform came a pretty grey and black striped cat with very large eyes; she looked quite at home, and I went to speak to her, but she turned aside to a corner below the stairs, and there stood an open box with clean shavings in it, and in the box amongst the shavings were two lovely tiny kittens. Pussy walked into the box and sat down with her little children. A porter came out of the same dingy little room from which the cat had come, and he took a glance at the box in the corner outside, and a smile spread over his grimy face, and puss looked up at him and purred. The next time I passed Gower-street Station the two little kittens were out on the platform, and playing round the feet of the porter who changed the notice telling where the trains went. The great noisy rushing train came into the station, but the two little kittens did not notice it a bit, and puss sat by watching them perfectly trustful and without a shade of fear. The porter turned the kittens round and showed them that they were to run away from the train, and they frolicked off towards their box. Don't you think that was a nice man, to be so kind to the three little cats? Another day when I passed I did not see the kittens or the cat or the box; and I asked a rather grand-looking solemn man in uniform whether the two little kittens had grown up and gone to new homes; his face brightened up, and he answered: "O no, they are both there still." They were evidently great pets with the men.

Some people are so cruel and thoughtless as to go away from home for their holidays and leave their cat behind, alone and uncared for. Do they never think of the poor little friend, left to shift for herself, and without a home that she can get into, and no one to feed her, whilst they are enjoying their holiday? I have seen so many poor lost and deserted cats in the streets, some so ill and starved and miserable, that it is quite piteous; and they are so grateful for a kind look or a little stroke and word of pity, that they run after you in hopes of being taken in. Do you know (you children who live in London) that there is a home for lost cats at 38, Ferdinand-street, Camden-town, N.W.? If you can keep a stray cat for a few hours, and send a postcard to that address, a little covered cart will come very quickly to fetch poor pussy away, and you have only to give a shilling to the man. Most of the cats that the cart takes they put to a painless death by giving them something which sends them quietly to sleep, and they never wake again; it seems sad, but how much better than slow starvation, and being hunted from one area to another—poor little things that love warmth and comfort and kindness.

One day I was in the Square garden, and a little cat was very friendly, and came and sat with me. All at once I heard a house-door shut, and pussy flew away towards the sound, and at the garden gate she met a big boy and a little girl—he carrying a jug of milk and a saucer, and she a little dish of food. The little cat was soon busy with her food, and another cat came and asked for some, and the children gave him a little too. But it was the little tortoise-shell cat that was their special friend. They had found her as a stray and deserted cat, trying to pick up a living for herself in the garden and Square; and every day they brought her food out into the garden, and she knew the sound of their house-door, though to me it sounded like any other. But I found that there was a delightful mystery about her, and the children began with whispers to go to a shady corner of the garden, when pussy had done her dinner, she running trustfully beside them. So I went after them to see what it was; and the children let me see all about it. And what do you think? There amongst the bushes was a large box (with a hinged lid to it), which the children's mother had let them give to pussy for her house. The lid was propped open with some sticks, so that she could get in and out and yet be sheltered from the rain; and there was a bit of carpet inside for a bed, and on the carpet in the box was—what? A wee kitten exactly like its mother, shaking about on little tottering straggling legs, with its eyes only just open! Pussy jumped in and licked it and talked to it, and then looked up trustfully at us. And these children never forgot to feed the little mother cat, and as the kitten grew bigger I saw them carrying it about the garden. Then they found a home for it, and I believe they found one for the mother cat, too, before the winter came. But very few stray little cats meet with such kind friends, and I thought you would like to hear these two little stories of nice people who were kind to the poor little animals, and learn that there is a "home" to send them to if you cannot feed and keep them. Keep the address of the home, and do not forget to write for that little cart to come and take any lost cats that would otherwise die a miserable death by starvation.

MAX MÜLLER.

BY the death of the Right Hon. Professor MAX MÜLLER Oxford loses a teacher whose voice had indeed long been silent within her walls, but whose fame is spread all round the world. His residence in the University covered a period of more than half-a-century—a period of immense change in the theological conceptions of English orthodoxy. In that change Professor MAX MÜLLER had no small share. He opened no direct attack upon the ancient strongholds. But he laboured with extraordinary patience and courage to secure the recognition of facts which placed the history of religion in an entirely new light. Almost alone and unaided he laid the foundation of the modern comparative study of religion, and he succeeded in inducing the most conservative University in the kingdom to undertake the colossal enterprise of publishing a series of translations from the greater Bible of the world.

Son of the poet, WILHELM MÜLLER, he carried with him into his studies the poet's sympathy for all forms of human thought and life, the poet's power to enter imaginatively into the ideas and the language of other races and times. It was this capacity for spiritual appreciation which made him so admirable an interpreter of the higher aspirations that lay hid in archaic modes of utterance which neither dictionary nor grammar could display. He insisted that they should always be estimated by their highest instead of their lowest. But this vivid sympathy never parted company with science, or forgot that the teacher must as far as possible know all the facts. Only an immense untiring industry, sedulously cultivated from his early student days, could have enabled Professor MAX MÜLLER to cope with so vast a variety of subjects. In his twenty-first year (1844) he opens his career as a scholar at Leipzig with a translation of a Sanskrit book of fables. He studies comparative philology at Berlin under BOPP, and philosophy under SCHELLING, whose genius had a distinct affinity with some of the Oriental teachings which he was afterwards himself to expound. He passes to Paris, where in 1845-46 he lays the foundations under the great French scholar, EUGENE BURNOUF, of that laborious task to which more than a quarter-of-a-century was to be dedicated, the publication of the ancient text of the hymns of the Rig Veda. With the help of Chevalier BUNSEN he settles at Oxford in 1847 ; the first volume is published in 1849 ; the sixth and last in 1873. In the oldest literary monument of the Aryans of India he finds the clues of language and of thought by which to explain the origins of classical mythology ; he introduces English students to comparative philology, and founds a school of interpretation of early myths, the principles of which were soon carried far beyond his first applications. He discusses the theory of evolution—from the side of language—with DARWIN. From the same point of view he approaches the science of human thought, flinging off as a kind of by-play a translation of KANT's "Critique of Pure Reason." With a zeal that never flags he produces two massive volumes of "Contributions to Mythology" in 1897 ; and only last year issued, at the age of seventy-five, an elaborate treatise on the "Six Systems of Indian Philosophy." And all this while new editions follow the old ; fresh texts are edited ; essays, lectures, books are poured out in swift succession ; a huge correspondence is maintained ; music and society are his diversions ; on rare occasions he intervenes in politics ; but he never relaxes his hold on the central interest of his life —the history of religion, its origin and development.

The Oxford to which the young MAX MÜLLER came in 1847 had recently felt the shocks of the Tractarian movement and the secession of NEWMAN and others to the Roman Church. JOWETT and STANLEY were planning their commentaries on the Pauline letters. Ten years later when the project of "Essays and Reviews" was first conceived, JOWETT could still deplore the "abominable system of terrorism which prevents the statement of the plainest facts." The Anglican Church, committed by its Articles (as Dr. RASHDALL reminded us a year or two back) to the doctrine that "the virtues of SOCRATES were sins," was not disposed to listen to any plea on behalf of religions outside the Bible. FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE had raised a courageous but solitary voice in his lectures on "The Religions of the World" ; and Professor MAX MÜLLER found it necessary (1858) to rebuke the spirit in which another student (with more learning but less charity), Mr. CHARLES HARDWICK, in his "Christ and other Masters," seemed to set himself to disparage alien forms of faith, "in a tone of offended orthodoxy, which may or may not be right in modern controversy, but which entirely disregards the fact that it has pleased GOD to let millions of human beings be born on earth without a chance of ever hearing of the existence of the Gospel." In 1859 the "History of Sanskrit Literature" laid stress on some of the higher elements in the Vedic hymns, and vindicated the reality of the moral and religious experience which they implied. Next year Professor MAX MÜLLER was a candidate for the Boden Professorship of Sanskrit. He was a German, and German theology was dreaded : he was the friend of BUNSEN, and the exposition of BUNSEN's researches in "Essays and Reviews," by Dr. ROWLAND WILLIAMS, had just begun to excite a kind of unreasoning rage. In STANLEY he found a staunch ally ; but STANLEY, too, was suspected. Orthodoxy was, for the most part, ranged on behalf of Professor MONIER WILLIAMS, though the names of the Bishop of OXFORD, PUSEY, and KEBLE among MAX MÜLLER's supporters ought to have disarmed apprehension. The appeal lay to the whole body of graduates assembled in Convocation. A few days before the battle JOWETT wrote from Balliol :—

> Dr. Stanley has been most kindly and vigorously trying to get an endowment for the Greek Professorship, but hitherto has been "dodged" by the inexhaustible resources of Dr. Pusey. . . . Mr. Müller is on the eve of his great contest, in which I wish him success, though I have never been able to settle whether he or Mr. Williams is likely to do most for the cause of Indian Missions. . . . About 1,400 "wild curates" and others are expected in Oxford on Friday.

The election went in favour of Professor MONIER WILLIAMS, but MAX MÜLLER pursued his way undisturbed. Always a champion of freedom, he urged STANLEY to invite Dr. COLENSO to preach in the Abbey, where he had himself appeared the year before (1873) as a layman, to discourse on Missions. Out of his stores of learning came lecture and essay all directed to the same end, the demonstration that "there is hardly one religion which does not contain some truth, some important truth, truth sufficient to enable those who seek the LORD and feel after Him, to find Him in their hour of need." He pointed to the broad and comprehensive spirit of the early Christian teachers, so different from that of the modern ecclesiastic ; and boldly affirmed that what men contemptuously called natural religion was in reality the greatest gift that GOD had bestowed on the children of men, for without it revealed religion itself would have no firm foundation, no living roots in the heart of men. The true sources of faith were thus something wider and deeper than any written record: they lay not in the reasonings of philosophy, but in the experience of the race (the Homeric line, "All men yearn after the gods," was one of his favourite quotations); and the history of religion was its real justification. By 1870 the time was ripening, and he delivered at the Royal Institution a short course of lectures, afterwards published as an "Introduction to the Science of Religion," which pleaded for the historical study of the Christian Scriptures, and the application of the same methods and canons of interpretation to the sacred books of all religions alike. Six years later he launched his great scheme for the publication of a series of translations from the Sacred Books of the East. No other scholar could have secured the co-operation needful for such an enterprise: no other scholar could have so successfully conciliated opposition, and rallied the forces of conservatism and orthodoxy to his support. When Dr. Pusey assented on condition that the sacred books of Christendom should not be included, the victory was won, though at the cost of a concession which Max Müller deeply regretted. Even until quite recently the prospect of adding these to his splendid series (now numbering forty-nine volumes) was often in his mind.

It was in India that Max Müller found thoughts most cognate with his own. When he opened the Hibbert lectures in the Chapter House at Westminster Abbey, it was from the Vedic hymns that he drew his theory of the original character and roots of religious belief. In his successive series of Gifford lectures the Hindu Scriptures supplied his most characteristic illustrations. Men smiled sometimes at their repetition; but the student soon discovered that the teacher had always a fresh outlook over the younger labourers around him, and rarely failed to find new material in each volume to help his own work.

Deeply convinced of the value of the English Church as a great national institution for the promotion of righteousness, Max Müller remained within its communion, and quite recently reaffirmed his former declaration in the words of St. Paul, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ." But to that Gospel he gave his own interpretation, and he did not always conceal the criticisms of orthodox doctrine which his studies in other religions suggested to him. The Oxford "Mag." with gentle sarcasm asserted that his last volume of Gifford lectures might have been delivered at Manchester College, where he had with frank cordiality, when once convinced that its profession of freedom was real, consented to act as Visitor. So the atmosphere of Indian thought always seemed more congenial to him. There religion was unhindered by creeds. In the philosophy of the Vedânta he found the nearest approach to some of his own convictions of the significance of life and its mysteries; and his voice would tremble with emotion as he read high sayings of teachers ancient or modern which shot like beams of light across the dark. With Keshub Chunder Sen he was united by a deep sympathy, and his interest in the Brahmo Somaj remained strong to the last. He maintained an active correspondence with native scholars, and often expressed his admiration for the distinguished leader of the Buddhist revival in India, H. Dharmapāla, who had—like so many others—found a warm welcome in his hospitable home.

When he bade Darwin good-bye after a conversation about the bearing of language on theories of Evolution, "You are a dangerous man," said the great naturalist. "There can be no danger in our search for truth," replied Max Müller. Many who once looked with apprehension on his ideas, have now learned that lesson. The England which he leaves is very different theologically from that which he entered more than fifty years ago. He has enforced by historical exposition, aided by a rare wealth of knowledge and a singular charm of style, the conviction which philosophy enforces in the abstract—namely, the unity of all religious experience in its elements of belief and worship, of trust and endeavour. He has made us realise that other religions, beside Christianity, must be judged by their best products rather than their worst; and the old limitations have gradually fallen away, and hurt no more. Full of years and honours, he passes onwards to solve the great secret: and men of all creeds unite to honour the spirit of his work.

A NAME AND SOMETHING MORE.

We publish to-day a further letter from the Rev. E. I. Fripp and a letter from the Rev. H. Rawlings on "The Unitarian Name," but we must distinctly say that we do not intend to try the patience of our readers or use up our space with any further correspondence on this interminable subject that can possibly be avoided. Mr. Clayden and Mr. Street must, of course, have the right of reply, if they desire it, and some further word seems to us due from Mr. Street; but beyond this, unless other correspondents have something really new and helpful to say, it is extremely unlikely that their letters will be published.

Mr. Rawlings takes up the position that it is useless to struggle against the inevitable, and that whether we like it or no, it is best to acquiesce in the world's persistent dubbing of our Free Churches as Unitarian, and that what we have to do is to be sure ourselves not to use the name in any narrow dogmatic sense, but by the fact of what we are as a body of religious people make it mean a broad spiritual unity. But we do not think that the time has come for any such issue out of what is undoubtedly from a practical point of view an extremely awkward position, and it seems wiser for the present to be patient with the multifarious title of our National Conference, and while as a people we cannot help being called "the Unitarian Body," to continue to insist that we are Unitarians who worship in Free Churches, and hold as the fundamental principle of our religious life that our churches must be free, unpledged to any special form of doctrine, and our fellowship perfectly open to all who desire union with us for religious work and worship in spirit and in truth.

At the same time it remains, of course, true for at any rate the great majority of us that our teaching will be distinctly and most earnestly Unitarian, though not necessarily of that ridiculous sort of Unitarianism which Mr. Fripp conjures up in his own mind to run a tilt at, afflicted with "dry intellectualism and hatred of mystery," and other dreadful things. We speak, we are sure, for a large body of present-day Unitarians when we profess with perfect sincerity a desire to profit by and assimilate in our own religious life whatever of profound truth there may be underlying the doctrine of the Trinity or any other ancient doctrine of the Church; and certainly there is nothing in our Unitarianism to prevent our acceptance of any of those new aspects of religious truth, of which Mr. Fripp evidently thinks we are sorely in need. He himself prefers not to be called a Unitarian, and in that preference is perfectly within his right; but we hope the day will never come when he will insist on shutting out Unitarians from his own religious fellowship, or cease from the endeavour to share with them the deeper religious life to which he may attain.

Mr. Fripp has taken hold of what we felt at the time of its publication to be a most unfortunate remark of Mr. Street's, but when he goes on to make the British and Foreign Unitarian Association responsible for that remark, and says "This hint expresses exactly the sort of pressure exerted by Essex Hall," &c., the inference is altogether unjustified. The Association exerts no such pressure, and the suggestion is entirely alien to the spirit in which it endeavours to serve the interests of our Free Churches. Mr. Fripp repeats a passage from his Derby paper, to the effect that the managers of the Association "are bent on making our Free Churches Unitarian Churches," and insists that it is their business to do so, and supposing the cry of heresy to be raised against himself, he adds, "The cry of heresy is now supported by all the influence of a rich and determined doctrinal Association." We must suppose these statements to be seriously made by Mr. Fripp, but it is painful to us to find that prejudice can go so far in utterly groundless misrepresentation.

We are quite aware that the Association, pledged to the "promotion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity" and "the support of its worship," would be in an anomalous position if it claimed or were supposed to be the central representative assembly of a group of Free Churches, which have perfect liberty to adopt Trinitarian teaching, if convinced of its truth, although they have no liberty to become "Trinitarian Churches"; but as a matter of fact the Association does not occupy that position. It is a society of individual subscribers, which in 1867 distinctly repudiated any congregational representation in its membership, and claims no authority whatever over churches, while it now cordially acknowledges the National Conference as the central body representative of the churches from which its own subscribers are chiefly drawn. If the Association as a well-established and capable administrative body is still entrusted by the Free Churches of this country with funds to be used for the support of the weaker among those churches and the establishment of others, the fault, if fault there be, must be charged not to the Association but to the churches themselves, and the remedy, whenever it is felt to be needed, is in the hands of the churches, by the strengthening of their own representative societies; it certainly will not be hastened, but rather hindered, by ungenerous and unjustified attacks upon the Unitarian Association.

Meanwhile, whatever part the Association has in the support of the churches and their ministers is fulfilled in a broad spirit, without suspicion of dogmatic inquisition, with the one object of sustaining and promoting genuine religious life, while in the establishment of new churches its influence is consistently thrown upon the side of the principle of Open Trusts. This may appear to Mr. FRIPP inconsistent with the aims of a Unitarian Association, but it is nevertheless the fact, and will remain so until a better logic, proving stronger than circumstance, succeeds in making our Church life over again.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NEW HERESY.

SIR,—I am sorry to have hurt the feelings of my friend Mr. Clayden. I am glad to have disturbed his Unitarian equanimity—as I should be to disturb that of a great many more—but I do not like to have made him angry.

And why should he be? I accept entirely his statement that to call Unitarian worship Free Christian is not honest; but I would add that it is not fair to claim Free Christian worship as Unitarian. Free Christian worship is worship which lays stress on the common elements of the Christian religion, and is, therefore, more or less acceptable to all Christians. This is the kind of worship I plead for, but I cordially dislike worship which is either Trinitarian or Unitarian; and as it is Unitarian and not Free Christian worship that the B. and F.U.A. exists to promote, I cannot sympathise with the work of that society.

At the same time I meant nothing disrespectful by the expression "men of Essex Hall." I simply said that these gentlemen "have been trying for years to make us all utter the Unitarian shibboleth, and are bent on making our Free churches Unitarian churches, and compelling those of us who cannot accept Unitarianism to leave their communion." And this is true. This is exactly what it is their business to do. They are members of an association with a doctrinal name and a close trust—the very features our churches have fought against for two hundred years. Nothing less than an Act of Parliament could make them admit any but Unitarians. The very object of their existence is to promote Unitarian worship. Therefore, the more faithful they are to their trust and the more earnestly they go to work, the more successfully they promote Unitarian worship in our churches and push out Free Christian worship, and make the position of us undenominationalists every year more difficult. I do not see how Mr. Clayden can deny this. At any rate, he will not meet the objection by quoting Shakspeare.

And by chance a striking illustration of what I say appears in your very next issue.

The Rev. C. J. Street is one of the men of Essex Hall. I suppose the B. and F.U.A. has not anywhere a more loyal supporter. But see what its narrow principle leads him to. He is reported to have said at the annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, at Newcastle, on 7th inst., that "he sometimes wondered whether Mr. Fripp and some of his friends would not do better to ally themselves with more genial companions and seek a fellowship with, say, the Established Church." This hint expresses exactly the sort of pressure exerted by Essex Hall. It tends not to broaden, but to narrow the spirit of our fellowship. It creates more and more an influence which says to those who do not think that Unitarianism is the final theology, "Had you not better go?"

Mr. Street says truly that I have learnt my lesson in a good school; but I venture to think I have learnt my lesson better than he has done. That school has taught me to follow Truth wherever it may lead, and to speak it when I find it. And having found, as I think, deeper realities than those expressed by the word Unitarian I intend to utter them. What does he mean by saying, "It is within the borders of the Free Churches that the principles of Truth, for which most of us stand, are being impugned"? I suppose by "principles of Truth" he means Unitarianism. Does he, then, assume that we who are dissatisfied with Unitarianism have no right to voice our dissatisfaction?

It is the old story. When the members of our Free Churches were mostly Calvinists, some few rose up and said "We are dissatisfied with Calvinism." Then they were rebuked, and it was said "Within our own borders the principles of Truth are being impugned." Later, when our congregations were predominantly Arian, some men declared they were not content with Arianism; and it was loudly cried "Arianism is being wounded in the house of its friends." Later, again, our people became Priestleyan Unitarians, and certain men who refused, in no gentle terms*, to accept Priestley's conclusions, were charged with "condemning their teachers and holding up to scorn the deepest feelings of their friends." And now when some of us are impatient altogether of the Unitarian controversy, thinking not only that an intellectual view of the personality of the Godhead is an impossible basis for a Church, but that our attitude of hostility to the Trinity has blinded our people not a little to profound truth underlying it, and are alarmed at the gradual shrinkage of our Free Churches to spiritual impotence under the complacency, the cock-sureness, and the dullness, too often associated with what is called Unitarianism, we are bidden to ally ourselves with more genial companions and seek another fellowship.

I say it is an old tale. But there is this new feature in our case—that whereas the pioneers of dissatisfaction among us in former times were opposed only by their fellow-members, the cry of heresy is now supported by all the influence of a rich and determined doctrinal association. In the old days there was no British and Foreign Calvinistic or Arian Association to block the way of further reform; but at Essex Hall there is now a powerfully organised society jealously eager to maintain the Unitarian position and ever throwing dust in the eyes of its critics by the amazing declaration that Unitarianism no longer means Unitarianism but a "Progressive Religious Faith"!

Into a discussion of Unitarianism itself I cannot now enter. It can only be considered in a non-controversial spirit. Nor is it anybody's business what I believe but my own and my people's to whom I minister. Until they are dissatisfied there will be no thought, even at the bidding of Mr. Street, of my seeking a more congenial fellowship. I stand, however, by my paper at Derby, and repeat that what Unitarianism is suffering from, disastrously, is its dry intellectualism and hatred of mystery. To my mind, no truth is more than a half-truth that depends alone on reason and does not bring us face to face with a miracle.

EDGAR I. FRIPP.

Mansfield, Oct. 23.

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

SIR,—Will you allow a letter upon the Unitarian name question, expressing feelings which are, I believe, very general amongst us, but which are also by their very nature reluctant to obtrude themselves?

1. Are not many of us utterly weary of this dismal and unprofitable controversy

* Even John James Tayler wrote, in 1855: "With the profoundest respect for the character and upright intentions and devout belief of Priestley, I must say, deliberately, that I know of no form of religious philosophy with which I have less sympathy, towards which I feel a more utter distaste and alienation, than his."

about a name? I am, and I hope I shall never trouble you again on the subject.

2. Of course, I have my pet name for "our Church." I should like very well the name which stands above Professor Peabody's admirable sermon, printed by you in two recent numbers, "The Church of the Spirit." I should like still better "The Church of Spiritual Unity." More than three years ago I publicly expressed a preference for a name which would embody the idea of the phrase "keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

3. But names are rarely fixed by preference alone — most rarely names of religious societies. And therefore I, for one, am content with the best name which can be made to serve the two purposes of any name—(a) to describe some actual fact for and concerning ourselves; (b) to enable other people to distinguish and identify our religious community so long as it is in any way separate from others.

4. Of course, for the second of these uses, even an arbitrary and meaningless symbol would do, if we could secure its general acceptance. For instance, we might call ourselves "the A B C Church." And if we could once get that name into currency, the worst that could be said against it would be that it implied no pretence to more than the A B C of religion—a charge which would at least credit us with modesty.

5. But men will insist upon taking and giving to religious societies names which serve purpose (a). And names given are not always those which would be taken voluntarily. Sometimes this happens because other people consider a fact to be of supreme importance, which we estimate at a lower value. Is not this precisely our case? Do not our brethren of other churches still consider the fact of supreme importance concerning us to be that the great majority of our members hold Unitarian doctrine? Why else are we excluded from Free Church Councils? Well, then, as long as this state of things continues, it is absolutely futile for us to attempt to throw off the name. Meanwhile, let us take every possible precaution against its becoming a legal or spiritual fetter, but let us frankly recognise that it will stick to us so long as we hold Unitarian doctrine and others think so highly of Trinitarian doctrine. When either of those conditions ceases, the name will cease to have any importance, and will drop away naturally.

6. The more we denounce and rebel against the name as linguistic currency, the lower in repute will it—and we—undeservedly and needlessly fall. We may well spend much pains in pointing out what are the correlatives of our Unitarianism—the correlatives which have changed the estimate of Unitarian doctrine as doctrine (and of all doctrinal forms) amongst Unitarians themselves—but to quarrel with others for giving us a name which is to them of the highest significance, and still more to quarrel amongst ourselves about a name which we cannot shake off, appears to me to be a grievous waste of time and energy, not to speak of the unhappy division and weakness it causes.

7. Mr. Fripp, in his recent paper, denounced the "intellectualism" with which he considers we are cursed. Sir, there is no operation of the mind more purely intellectual than the discussion of the fitness of given names for given facts. And this piece of "intellectualism" is doing us more harm than anything else. See how it sets men against one another who are agreed in all spiritual ideas and aspirations. It is of Logic, not Religion, that Mill says—"It includes the operation of Naming."—("Logic," Introduction, § 7).

8. The objection to the Unitarian name is that it hinders, or at least endangers, spiritual freedom and spiritual unity. But how can a mere name have such awful effects? Only bigotry and stupidity can do that. And a man who is against a name may be just as bigoted and stupid as anyone who is for it. Besides, can we not teach the idea or doctrine of the Divine Unity in such a way that it shall be more conducive to spiritual freedom and spiritual unity than any other idea or doctrine? Surely we can; and surely those are not only to be pardoned, but respected, who cling to the Unitarian name on this ground. Nevertheless, if we look after the idea or doctrine, the name will perhaps look after itself. This applies to all names. Some of those who are hotly against the Unitarian name are hotly for the Christian name. I had much rather be called a Christian than call myself one. Clamour either for or against titles or badges is not a sign of spiritual health. If a man were convicted on false evidence of the most heinous crime, he would not prove his innocence by rebelling against the prison dress. He would show more dignity and heroism by saying nothing about it while working and waiting for the unveiling of the truth. And if a man believed himself to have found a more precious stone than any yet discovered, would he not, if wise, be more anxious to proclaim its beauties, and to put its qualities to service than to haggle for or against particular names for it?

H. RAWLINGS.

A MANUAL OF UNITARIAN HISTORY.

SIR,—At the recent meetings, at Sheffield, of the B. and F. U. Association Sir John Brunner, the president, pointed out the need there is of a history of the creeds, with some account of the great names which have shed lustre, not only on our faith, but also on the nation to which they belonged, on both sides of the Atlantic. What Sir John had in mind was, I presume, a history of the movement of liberal religious thought commonly known as Unitarianism. I strongly sympathise with this idea, and if some one competent for the work will take it up, he will confer a boon upon our churches which will supply a long felt want, and which I feel sure will be gladly welcomed. The book should be written in a popular and attractive style, so that it may be put into the hands of our Sunday scholars who grow up amongst us, and in large numbers leave us without knowing anything either of the history or the principles of our faith. Moreover, it should be brought out at a popular price, so that it may be within the reach of the poorest. Such a manual would be most valuable for preparation classes, either for teachers or for confirmation, and it would be one of the best missionaries that could be sent out by our Postal Missions. I feel certain that if our young people knew more of our history, and the noble heritage we have received from the past, they would feel prouder of their faith, and would be inspired with a greater root sustaining power. JOHN FOX.

CONFERENCE OF WOMEN WORKERS.

THE yearly Conference of the National Union of Women Workers was held last week at Brighton, which proved an excellent gathering place for the meetings. The weather was bright and pleasant for the most part; the local committee had made admirable arrangements; the Dome and Pavilion, fantastic as they are, afford rooms more spacious and convenient than most towns can boast, and the civic authorities, in the person of the Mayor, gave a most hospitable welcome to the delegates at a conversazione on the final evening.

The President for this year is the Hon. Mrs. A. T. Lyttleton, wife of the Bishop of Southampton, and her opening address was an eloquent appeal to the love of Englishwomen for their country in this time of strain and stress. Many of her hearers could by no means agree with her view that the war had brought with it a quickening of the national life which had raised it to a higher level than it had ever reached before, and from which she trusted it would never fall; but all agreed in the necessity for earnest endeavour to combat the evils all deplored, and to serve worthily the country all love so well.

Mrs. Lyttleton is a good speaker and the most genial of leaders, and the Union is fortunate in securing her services for a second year of office.

The most largely attended meeting was that on Wednesday afternoon, when the huge Dome was packed, to hear papers by Mrs. Creighton, Mrs. Flora A. Steel, the Countess of Aberdeen, and the Hon. Emily Kinnaird. Mrs. Creighton's subject, "The Modern Home," was admirably treated, with wise and sympathetic words for all the constituent members of the home, urging the claims of individual development of faculty, but showing how this should help, and not hinder, the harmonious character of the whole.

Mrs. Steel's paper took the form of a scathing indictment of the large majority of English women in India, on the ground of their failure to recognise that they, as well as their husbands, had duties and responsibilities towards the natives; and that, consequently, the good name of England often suffered at their hands. As one instance, she mentioned the fact that, of the thousands who go, not one in a hundred ever dreams of learning the language of the country where her children are born and the best years of her own life are spent.

Another afternoon was devoted to interesting reports of work done among poor and afflicted children, and Mrs. Humphry Ward's delightful account of the gathering in of crippled children at the Passmore Edwards' settlement, and their training under the auspices of the London School Board, was listened to by a crowded and sympathetic audience. Then came the great problems of the housing of the poor, education, and domestic service; but perhaps the most important questions before the meetings were those concerned with the work and position of women on Public Boards.

Many circumstances concur to make this a burning question at the present time, notably the exclusion of women from the new London Borough Councils, and the imminent danger of their not being properly represented on the local educational authorities about to be called into existence. Lady Laura Ridding read a paper on the latter subject, and pointed out that not only secondary, but elementary education also, would probably be confided to these bodies in the near future, and that, unless the inclusion of women were secured by legislation, there was grave risk of the country's losing the services of the women who had already done such valuable work as members of School Boards.

The Legislation Committee of the Union (as well as the Women's Local Government Society) has this important matter in hand, and many other sections of the N.U.W.W., which we have not space even to name, carry on valuable work between the Conferences, as testified by their reports read at the annual meeting.

SHORT NOTICES.

Tennyson, his Art and Relation to Modern Life, by Stopford A. Brooke, is a second edition in two small volumes of the book which first appeared in April, 1894. There is no study of a modern poet for which we have been more grateful, or that we have read with more unmixed delight. In its new and cheaper form, much pleasanter to handle, we must hope that it will have an even wider circulation than before. There are no alterations, so far as we have noticed in the text; but a fuller index is added to each volume, and each has for frontispiece a portrait of Tennyson, the first from the well-known engraving of Samuel Lawrence's early crayon drawing, the second from a later photograph. These volumes, like the new edition of Plumtre's "Dante," are bound in limp leather. (Isbister and Co. 2s. 6d. each, net).

The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, by Alfred Edersheim, M.A., D.D., which when first published in 1883 cost two guineas, is now offered by the publishers at a greatly reduced price. This work is one of the best of the "Lives" of Christ, written from the traditional point of view, and is specially valuable for the fulness with which, with ample knowledge, it presents the Jewish background of the story. It is a somewhat monumental work in two large volumes. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 12s. net.)

Voices of Prayer from many Lips is a little book of short passages of prayer, edited by Miss Emily Sharpe, and gathered from thirty-one different sources, as various as Polycarp and Simplicius, the service book of German and Polish Jews, Fenelon, Jeremy Taylor, Watts, Butler, Lindsey, Wellbeloved, Harriet Martineau, Travers Madge, George Dawson, and Theodore Parker. More selections are made from Fletcher's "Family Devotions" than from any other source, and the older Unitarians are largely represented. The prayers are classified under a number of headings touching upon the chief points of the religious life, and there is an index of subjects. (Unitarian Christian Publishing Company. 1s.)

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

As the last months of the nineteenth century are closing in upon us, we naturally take a glance backward to find some encouragement with which to enter the coming century. That we stand in a noble succession cannot be questioned. Our Provincial Assembly's short history of about eleven years has no mean record. We are proud of our founder, the gifted and saintly Dr. Martineau, and of those who have presided over its councils. As an Assembly of Non-Subscribing Churches, we may justly be thankful for the great principle of liberty which underlies all our organisations. We believe in freedom of thought. We have faith in the living Church of the future, and therefore do not seek to bind it with the theological conceptions of the present. We hold that no builder of a church has any moral right to protect it by theological shutters from sharing the public enlightenment. And, as a general principle, it is most inexpedient that men should have the power to control the property of the world after they are dead. We have too much reverence for truth, and for the Spirit of God, to attempt to put upon posterity the poor limitations of our weak thought.

During the last quarter of the century religion has been passing through one of those epochs of change and upheaval which are really a part of the history of religion, as the changes which have left their mark upon the earth are a part of its physical life. As in Nature and the earth's history, so it is in religion, settlement and reformation go in equal pace with change and upheaval. One of the most benign and fruitful gains which have occurred from all this unsettlement and breaking up of old creeds, is the growth of free thought in religion—the search after truth, unhindered by enfeebling fear and restraining prejudice. No feature of the present is more gladdening and full of hope, that religious thought has to a large extent been set free from the old fetters which held it in bondage. It would have been very gratifying if this revival of intelligent faith and rational religion had brought larger accessions to our churches, but we are thankful that the principles for which we have contended so long, and so earnestly, are permeating the minds and hearts of men in all religious communities, and, doubtless, the time will come when the old bottles will be able no longer to contain the new wine. Whether our churches will provide a home for the increasing number of religious free-thinkers we cannot prophecy, but of this we have little doubt that the new century, even in its earlier years, will witness ecclesiastical developments undreamed of by those who are content to dwell in their own fenced-in corners of the great fold, and see nothing beyond it. A spiritual resurrection is in progress which will erelong change the whole face of Christendom. The dry bones in the valley of orthodoxy are being clothed by the Spirit of God with living flesh, and will soon rise up an exceeding great army breathing a new spirit of faith and love, that will be strong to vanquish the hosts of sin and death. Because other Churches are moving rapidly in our direction, and men are beginning to see that the Kingdom of God is a larger and grander thing than they had thought it to be, and its essential elements fewer and simpler, we must not relax our efforts. There is a great need still for the testimony we have to bear, and the Gospel it is our privilege to declare, and thus to help forward that glorious time when creeds will be no barrier to religious fellowship, and when Churches will be based upon spiritual freedom.

During the short period of the Assembly's existence it can look back, not with the proud satisfaction of fidelity in failure, but in humble joy of a certain amount of success. It has brought into closer fellowship the churches that were isolated from each other, it has strengthened the hands of those who have been toiling on amid discouragements and difficulties, and established churches in districts where our principles were but little known. Whatever the drawbacks of unfavourable circumstances and of conscious shortcomings, we have reasons for thankfulness, and for the hope which thankfulness generates.

The annual meetings of the Assembly which were lately held at Horsham were of the most satisfactory character. The attendance was large and representative; the reports were encouraging; the sermon and the addresses were full of inspiration. We all felt "it was good to be there," and many were the expressions of gratitude for the quickening thoughts and the generous hospitality which had been given. Valuable suggestions were made, which, if acted upon, will be productive of immense good to our little group of churches in the twentieth century. Since the annual meeting the church at Southend, established by the late Rev. R. Spears, has been fortunate in securing the services of Lieutenant Dear, who has lately retired from the Army. Originally trained for the ministry, he now returns to the work whose claims he had always practically acknowledged. He has consented to take the oversight of the church for six months with a view to the permanent pastorate. The arrangement has the heartiest approval of the Assembly. The want of a resident minister has been felt for some time, and we regard it as an auspicious circumstance that the want will now be met. Some of our friends may know that Mr. Dear has been "at the front" in the Transvaal, and was invalided home about six months ago. And whatever distant advantages may arise from that unfortunate war we are reaping an immediate benefit in the services which Mr. Dear is enabled to render at Southend.

Halstead in Essex has now been enrolled among the churches of the Assembly. Hitherto it had been associated with the Eastern Union, but so many difficulties were experienced in supplying the pulpit that an appeal was made to the Provincial Assembly to undertake the charge of the congregation, which consists of about thirty to forty adults, and a stringed band which leads the hymns and discourses sacred music exceedingly well. At present the services are held fortnightly, conducted by ministers and lay-preachers from London.

At Sydenham special services were held during the latter part of the last, and the first half of the present, year. During the summer months they were suspended, and several of the friends expressed a strong desire that they should be resumed in the autumn, and promised their practical sympathy. The attendances averaged from thirty to forty adults. The services were recommenced on Sunday, Oct. 14, when the attendance was somewhat below the average. Several were absent who had pledged their support. Whether social or commercial considerations have influenced them we cannot tell, but already we have met with instances in connection with the movement at Sydenham, of those in full sympathy with our teaching, who are unable to identify themselves with it, because of social considerations. The hall has been taken till the end of the year, and by that time it will be seen if the response is sufficient to justify any permanent effort.

The church at Reading is still without a pastor. While in many ways the interregnum brings with it disadvantages, it also stimulates the principle of self-help, which is no mean compensation. Members of the congregation frequently conduct the services, and so the work of mutual edification (which should be one of the chief aims of church life) is carried on. The congregation at Tunbridge Wells has been doing this very thing, with a fair amount of success during the past six years. This is a work which needs to be more largely developed, especially where there is little prospect of a settled ministry. Where churches are not too far apart geographically, it would be an immense advantage to have them grouped into circuits, as among the Methodists, with a resident minister as superintendent, assisted by intelligent lay-preachers. The church at Brighton has welcomed to the pastorate the Rev. H. M. Livens, late of Bolton. Already the congregation has increased in numbers, and the outlook is certainly full of encouragement.

The various churches in the province are doing a quiet, steady, plodding work—a work which makes a supreme demand upon their faith; but if we are to be successful workers, we must have faith in our Mission and Message. If we think that ours is a forlorn hope, then failure will be the inevitable result. "If there be a faith which can remove mountains," says Annie Besant in her most pathetic biography, "if there be a faith which can remove mountains of ignorance and evil, it is surely that faith in the ultimate triumph of Right, in the final enthronement of Justice, which alone makes life worth living, and which illumines the blackest cloud of depression with the rainbow-coloured arch of immortal hope. It is under the inspiration of this faith that we must go forward into the coming century believing that we are, each one of us, individually called to take part in the great struggle with error and sin. We need to cherish a larger faith in the world forces, and in the Divine Influences which are working in us and for us, for the overthrow of all wrong, and for the establishment of the Kingdom of truth and righteousness in the world.

Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Paget Toynbee, per Miss Cobb, 10s.; Walthamstow Sunday-school Collection, 7s.; F. W. L., £5; Mrs. E. A. Wurtzburg, £1 1s.; Miss Tennant, 10s.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth.—At the opening meeting of a Literary Society on Wednesday, Oct. 24, the Rev. M. R. Scott in the chair, a lecture was given by Mrs. Collins Odgers, of Bury, on the "Passion Play," illustrated by views of Ober-Ammergau and photographs of the chief performers. A cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Odgers was moved by Miss C. Yates, the secretary, and seconded by the Vicar of Ainsworth.

Birkenhead.—A three days' Sale of Work in the interest of the Unitarian Church was opened on Thursday, Oct. 25, by the Hon. Mrs. de Beaumont Klein, in the schoolroom, Bessborough-road, the chair being taken by Mr. C. W. Willmer. In declaring the sale open, Mrs. Klein referred with satisfaction to the title chosen, rather than that of bazaar, as due perhaps to the oft-repeated protest against bazaars and their peculiar ethics, and as representing something more in keeping with the high ideals whose promotion was intended. With others she was looking forward to the time when religious interest would have become so closely associated with the preoccupation of their lives that the sacred duty of supporting religious work by a liberal contribution according to their means would no longer depend on constant appeals from without but rather upon the spontaneous impulse from within. Referring to the immense significance of the opening of new school-buildings of a new place of worship, she said they loved and reverenced the old places of worship, those ancient buildings, often quaint, uncomfortable and out of date, in which their spiritual forefathers had toiled and prayed for truth and freedom. They remembered with emotion the slowly, silently but steadily progressive evolution of thought and feeling which had taken place since their foundation, how men and women of good-will struggled in them towards a more honest harmony between their knowledge and their hopes, between their faith and their works. And their most precious legacy had been not so much the result attained, but the sacred conviction that the spiritual evolution which had transformed and ennobled their aspirations was working still. The link of continuity in church life which bound them to so great a past must be preserved, but without adopting an attitude of morose conservatism out of all relation to sound views of evolution. Neither in Natural History nor in Religion could the future be built up only on disused organs. The thoughts and feelings of the present could not be merely those of the past. They saw on every side good men and women fruitlessly striving to abide in beliefs and institutions from which the assurance of reality had departed. When ancient trusts failed them and the ever-present longing of the human heart for religious fellowship remained, it was for their Free Churches to afford a haven of rest for such weary souls. But that would be hindered by too much clinging in those churches to old institutions and old methods. Thus lack of appreciation of the place of Art in worship, of beauty by the side of truth and goodness was a hindrance, so that their worship was apt to look maimed and poor, and to chill where it ought to warm and inspire. It was not mental breadth alone that would establish the universal religion. All the highest aspirations of men's nature must find satisfaction in it, and all things truly human must have a place in the light of their divine origin. Referring to the periodical outbreak of controversy as to the name by which their churches ought to be called, Mrs. Klein said the end usually was that no better name having yet been discovered, they must still continue to use "Unitarian" under pain of being left nameless. To her the most pressing duty for each generation seemed rather to be to settle in their churches the meaning attached to their religious name, whatever it might be. A name was only a symbol, the meaning attached to it was everything, and they valued their freedom so much, because it allowed them to make their name a symbol not of the past but of the present, by a free progressive interpretation of its meaning. She feared little from a name in respect to the future, which had permitted of such great spiritual advances in the past history of their churches. For that future they had to labour bravely and unselfishly, knowing that others would enter into their labours; they had to help in laying the foundation of that glorious Temple in which the clamour of conflicting names should no more be heard. A cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Klein was passed on the motion of the Rev. J. Crossley, seconded by Miss C. B. Cooke. On the following day the sale was opened by Mr. Charles W. Jones, J.P., who expressed his pleasure in doing anything to help the Unitarian faith. He was not ashamed of the name, and thought it ought to be used everywhere; he was proud to say it meant a church which tried to carry out its religion on week days as well as on Sundays. He pleaded for more sincerity in religion, and referring to the meeting at Garston on the previous evening, said that their larger churches ought to establish branches in other parts of the town, to the care of which the minister and curate should devote their time. That was different from handing over guineas to an institution and leaving it to deal with them. The sale on Saturday was opened by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who expressed the pleasure which he felt in once more visiting the schoolroom which he had declared open for the service of the congregation at the beginning of the year. He had learnt, then, that the principal use to which that room would be put was for the purposes of a Sunday-school. He believed in Sunday-schools, especially in Sunday-schools such as theirs, where no attempt was made to cram into the minds of little children statements of dogmatic belief. Referring with pleasure to the presence on the platform of the Mayor of Birkenhead, Sir John said he might claim that Unitarians had themselves done something to soften the asperities between rival creeds, and to render it more possible for those who differed from each other on religious grounds to work together cordially for social and philanthropic purposes. The result of the sale was understood to be fairly satisfactory, in spite of the unfortunate weather on the second day.

Bristol.—A musical service was held at Lewin's Mead on Sunday evening, selections being given from Gounod's "Redemption." Mr. J. Y. Pearce was at the organ, and Mr. Fred Watts led the orchestra. There was a good congregation, and both vocal and instrumental selections, which were admirably rendered, were evidently much appreciated. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., gave a short address, speaking of the comforting and uplifting influence of music. He asked—Was not the sweet story they had read from the Old Testament (1 Samuel xvi.) easy to be perceived, and should they not say that in the very sound of music there were blessing and refreshing power? God was the author of all that was good and all that was sweet, and what joy He flung upon the troubled and torn world when He taught the human voice to sing, and threw gratitude and trust into the old hymns that had echoed through the ages, and whose memory was enshrined in all the churches of Christ, amongst their dearest treasures, and amongst the most persuasive aids to reverent and uplifting religious worship!

Bury.—The Rev. J. C. Odgers is delivering a course of Sunday evening lectures in Bank-street Chapel on "Scenes and Characters represented in the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau." The course began on Oct. 21 with "Jesus Welcomed," and is to end on Dec. 16 with "Nicodemus, the Truth-seeker."

Chelmsford.—On Thursday, Oct. 25, a lecture was given in the Unitarian Chapel by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, formerly of Chelmsford, on "The Housing of the Poor." He described the terrible house-famine in Liverpool as well as London. Mr. E. J. Harry, in proposing a vote of thanks, said attention must be persistently called to the question until the nation woke up to the fact of the physical and moral deterioration which was the inevitable result of the present condition of things.

Chichester.—In continuation of the special discourses commenced last month, the minister has announced as the subject for the four Sundays in November, "Salvation, What is It?"

Croydon Domestic Mission.—The anniversary meeting took place at Dennett Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, when a good number were present. The chair was taken by Mr. Councillor Dyer, who, in his opening speech, expressed himself surprised at the large amount of work done by so few people, and with such very small means. After the adoption of the report, the Rev. J. Page Hopps addressed the meeting, followed by Mr. A. Cantley, Mrs. Armfield, and others. The feeling was strong that still more good could be done in the neighbourhood if more means could be obtained. Mr. H. Green (treasurer) announced that his brother, the Lord Mayor-elect, had invited the Sunday scholars of Dennett Hall to see the Lord Mayor's Show, and that seats would be provided for them.

Deal.—A very successful social meeting was held on Tuesday evening, the numbers present being larger than at any other meeting for several years. Many present were young people, to whom the minister addressed a brief explanation of our theological views, and intends enlarging upon their bearing in five minutes' addresses at future meetings. A resolution was passed on the lines of that issued by the Essex Hall Temperance Association in favour of legislation on those points upon which both the majority and minority reports of the Licensing Commission are agreed.

Dover.—The Rev. S. Burrows preached at Adrian-street on the evening of Sunday week, on his impressions of the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau, describing its origin and the various scenes. The whole representation, he said, was rendered with the utmost reverence, and the effect of thus vividly portraying the sacred story could only be good both for audience and actors.

Eastbourne.—A reading circle has been started by the congregation worshipping in the Masonic Room, on Wednesday evenings, under the leadership of the Rev. George St. Clair. The book in use at present is Dr. Crosskey's "Method of Creation"; but a variety of entertainment is contemplated. Though started by the Unitarians, it is intended that the membership shall be open to all suitable persons. Eastbourne having been recently placarded with the announcement of "Christian Evidence" lectures, by Mr. R. J. Linton, the Rev. G. St. Clair attended one on "Three Persons in One God," and when invited at the close to speak, combatted the lecturer's arguments. The result was that a public debate was arranged, and took place on Thursday and Friday of last week. Mr. Linton's arguments were of the least enlightened kind, and on the second day he became abusive. A vote which was taken went against Mr. St. Clair, showing the futility of such proceedings, but considerable sympathy was manifested by the audience towards the heretic.

Framlingham and Bedfield.—On Sunday last the annual sermons were preached at Framlingham and Bedfield by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. A deputation from the Central Postal Mission, consisting of Miss Tagart, Mrs. A. Lawrence, Mrs. Summers, Miss E. M. Lawrence, and Miss L. J. Tagart, came down from London to take part in the meetings, and there were good congregations. On Monday a sale of work was held at Framlingham, and was opened at three o'clock by Mrs. Summers, supported by the other London friends. In the evening a tea-party was held, followed by a public meeting, at which Mr. Youngman presided, and was supported by Miss Tagart, the Revs. A. Amey and W. C. Bowie, and Mr. Dowsing, who spoke; Mrs. A. Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. Sangster, and Miss Edith Lawrence supplying music. On Tuesday there was a sale of work at Bedfield, also followed by a tea-party, and a meeting at which Miss Tagart presided and Mrs. Summers, Miss E. M. Lawrence, the Rev. Alfred Hall of Norwich, the Rev. A. Amey, Mr. Dowsing and Mr. Goldstein spoke. The London friends and the Bedfield children provided music. The sales of work produced £9 6s. 2d., to be devoted to the work at Bedfield.

Glasgow (Appointment).—The Rev. James Forrest, M.A., late of Sale, and formerly M'Quaker Trust Lecturer for Scotland, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church.

Guildford.—"Citizen Sunday" was observed at Ward-street Church by addresses upon the "Religion of Citizenship." After evening service the quarterly congregational meeting took place, when Miss Edith Tyrrell and Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., C.C., gave very interesting addresses upon their visit as delegates to the Horsham Provincial Assembly Meeting. Grateful tributes were paid to the kindness of the friends at Horsham. On Monday last a lecture was given to the Literary Society by Mr. Ernest Radford, M.A., on "Church Doors and Windows," illustrated from Gothic Architecture. The lecture was well attended and warmly appreciated.

Hull.—On Wednesday, Oct. 24, the Park-street Literary and Social Union entered upon its forty-first session. The President, the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., assisted by Mrs. Dixon, in the unfortunate absence of Mrs. Lummis through illness, were "At Home" to the members of the Union in the schoolroom adjoining the church. A very enjoyable evening was spent. A syllabus replete with good things ensures for the Union a successful session.

Liverpool: Garston.—A meeting was held in the Co-operative Hall, Garston, on Thursday evening, Oct. 25, to welcome the Rev. H. D. Roberts as minister-at-large of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, with special charge of the Garston congregation. The chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. Klein, who offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Roberts. Mr. Charles W. Jones and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong joined in the welcome, and Mr. Boyl spoke on behalf of the Garston congregation. A letter of regret for absence was read from Alderman W. B. Bowring. The next speaker was Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who dwelt upon the importance of a knowledge of the history of their churches, and urged them to let their work be marked by sincerity in all things, for as they showed their sincerity in religion their blessed influence would extend. The Rev. J. C. Hirst also added some words of welcome. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, in responding, said he was glad, for many reasons, that the meeting had been postponed, for he had had time, in consequence, to become acquainted with the earnest band at Garston. He had learnt their wants, too. The most pressing one was a piano, for social and entertaining purposes. The faithful few at the Mission had procured an American organ for their services, and it represented much energy and self-denial on their part. Would any generous friend help those who had thus helped themselves, and give them a piano—if possible, by Nov. 27? A more modest request he might make, for a blackboard and easel, needed for their children's services; and for a few games for the interesting little band of children connected with them. He thanked them very heartily for their cordial welcome to himself and his wife, and could only hope that the work they both intended to do in Garston would justify, to some small extent, all the kind and appreciative things that had been said.

London Bazaar.—The sale which was opened at Essex Hall by Lady O'Hagan, on Thursday, Oct. 25, as we recorded last week, for the purpose of disposing of goods left over from the London Unitarian Bazaar, was satisfactory in so far as it realised about £73; but a good many things were sold at a ruinous reduction in price. We understand that a number of gentlemen's hard felt hats (not soft parsons' hats) are still to be had at a ridiculously low figure. The entertainments provided at the sale were greatly enjoyed.

Manchester: Bradford.—The first annual congregational party and meeting in the new building was held on Saturday, Oct. 27, and was well attended. After tea the Rev. W. E. Atack took the chair, and the Rev. C. Roper attended, representing the Governing Body of the District Association. Much gratification was expressed at the substantial progress which had been recorded during the year, and the bright outlook which presented itself for the future. Mr. Roper encouraged the congregation to strive after greater independence. The winter's work is now in full swing, and includes a Social Union, with lectures and debates, a millinery class, drill class, &c., which are all well attended and very successful.

Manchester: Heaton Moor.—The building now being erected by the Manchester District Association for the Heaton Moor congregation is nearly finished, and the opening is to take place on Saturday, Dec. 8, when the first service will be conducted by the Rev. Priestley Prime, and the sermon will be preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., has promised to speak at the evening meeting, and there will be a deputation from the Association which has so materially helped the congregation. The new building is a school-church, and will be the third opened as the result of the Forward Movement of the Manchester Association. General satisfaction is expressed at the appearance of the building and its promise of usefulness. When local contributions have been collected, and with the help of a liberal collection at the opening and a Sale of Work, for which the ladies are now preparing, it is expected that the church will be free from debt.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Ashton-under-Lyne on Saturday last. About 150 teachers and friends were present. After tea the Committee met to consider a long agenda of business prior to the general meeting. The meeting elected officers as follows:—President, the Rev. T. R. Elliott; vice-president, Mr. E. B. Broadrick; hon. secretary, Mr. Albert Slater; treasurer, Mr. Samuel Ashworth. The retiring President, Mr. J. Barrow, occupied the chair. The Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., read an excellent paper, entitled "A Contrast," in which he portrayed in a most forcible manner the real and the ideal Sunday-school of to-day. A good discussion followed, and after the usual votes of thanks, the evening hymn and benediction closed a most profitable gathering.

Rotherham.—The Literary and Social Union of the Church of Our Father opened its new session on Tuesday, Oct. 23, with a tea-meeting and concert, when addresses were also given by the Revs. W. Stephens, J. E. Manning, and J. Ellis. Close upon 100 members and friends sat down to tea, and there was a capital musical programme.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A most successful reunion gathering of old scholars and teachers of the Sunday-school was held in the Channing Hall on Monday evening, when 130 sat down to tea. After a short interval, which afforded an opportunity of seeing the new vestry and the recently-erected memorial tablet to the Rev. Timothy Jollie, the meeting proper took place, the attendance being upwards of 200. The Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., presided, and a very pleasant evening was passed, with musical selections, short addresses, and recitations from past and present teachers, and intervals for social discourse. During the evening a hymn was read to the meeting, which had been specially written for the occasion by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

Stockport.—The annual congregational soirée was held in the schoolroom on Thursday, Oct. 25. After tea, the chair was taken by Mr. J. J. Jordan, the senior warden, and short speeches were made by the chairman, the minister (the Rev. B. C. Constable), Mr. Kelsey White (senior student of the Home Missionary College, Manchester), and Mr. O. E. Heys. Mr. Constable read extracts from an old copy of the Stockport Advertiser, which had been lent to him, which contained a remarkably scurrilous article on the opening of the new Unitarian Church in St. Petersgate on March 23, 1842. The article was a column and a quarter in length, and was headed, "The New Anti-Christian Conventicle." Mr. Constable remarked upon the great change of attitude towards Unitarians since those days, and pointed out that it was not because Unitarians had abandoned their views—they were practically the same now as then—but because orthodox Christians had gradually approached nearer and nearer to them. There was a very good attendance, and the evening was much enjoyed. On Sunday last, the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., of Denton, who delivered two excellent discourses.

Swansea.—Last Sunday evening, by invitation of the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, the pulpit of the Unitarian Church was occupied by the Rev. W. Harold Davies, minister of the Mount Calvary Baptist Chapel, St. Thomas, Swansea, who is just severing his connection with the Baptist denomination, on the ground that he can no longer believe the accepted doctrines, and that fidelity to truth compels him openly to acknowledge it by coming out. Mr. Davies, who is a young man and the son of a Baptist minister, made a statement on Sunday evening explaining his position, and hopes to enter the Unitarian ministry.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, as will be seen from an advertisement in another column, is to be held on Thursday next, at Essex Hall. The chair is to be taken by the President, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., supported by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., Messrs. Hahnemann Epps, P. W. Clayden, and others, so that there should be some good speaking. The prospect of increased activity opened by the success of the recent Bazaar should also ensure an added interest to the meeting and a full attendance of members and friends.

THE fourth of Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was given at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, of Kilburn, in the chair. The lecture was on "The Gospel Question: (i.) The Synoptics," and traced the advances of Gospel criticism during the last twenty-five years, moving on from the position of the Tübingen school, represented in England by "Supernatural Religion" (1874) to a general consensus among scholars as to the priority of "Mark" and the relative position of the other gospels. Mr. Carpenter also pointed out that in addition to such literary criticism of the gospels there were other considerations in regard to country and nationality and current beliefs, which must affect their judgment as to the actual life and teaching of Jesus and its presentment in the gospel narrative. The lecture next Tuesday is on "The Fourth Gospel," and the concluding lecture of the course, on Nov. 20, is on "The Bible and the Church."

THE "Stopford Brooke Lectureship" at University College was inaugurated on Thursday evening, Nov. 1, by a lecture on "Poetry" by Mr. Stopford Brooke himself, who is to hold the lectureship as long as he is willing to do so. The Botanical Theatre, where the lecture was held, was filled by an audience of about 450, and Dr. Blake Odgers, who took the chair, said that they had received applications for 1,000 tickets. They had been allotted strictly in the order of application up to the limit of the accommodation, except that subscribers to the Lectureship Fund had first been given an opportunity of securing tickets. But the great majority of those present were not subscribers, though he hoped a good many of them would become so. The intention was that so far as possible the lectures should always be freely open to the public, though owing to the limits of space admission had to be by ticket.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE at the beginning of the lecture offered his sincere thanks to those who had arranged the lectureship and had given so much time and affectionate loving-kindness to the work. It came to him with a pleasant and humbling surprise that what he had done in literature had been appreciated by a far larger number of friends and in a far higher way than he could have imagined. Proceeding with his lecture on "Poetry," Mr. Brooke spoke of the energy of the spiritual universe as universal love and thought. From the union of these two came beauty, which, born in rapture, brought to all her work immortal joy. In man the power of imagination was a creative spirit, which took all the forms of beauty in Nature and in human nature, and re-shaped them, adding to the thought and love in them the man's own personal thought and passion, to make a new form of beauty—and that was Art. The true artist was not an imitator, but a creator, who shaped into outward forms all the spiritual forms of beauty created within by imagination. He put the spiritual into the material. There were many vehicles of art, but there were elements common to them all: matter of thought, love, beauty, joy, creation, composition and style. These all belonged to every work of true art, filled with and revealing the special character and personality of the artist; and imagination was the breath and spirit of them all. That showed how absurd it was to attempt to define in a sentence what any art was. As to poetry, beyond what he had described there was a second half, which had reference to its special vehicle and subject matter, as distinguished from other arts, and that he hoped to deal with in the opening lecture of the second course. The remaining four lectures of the present course are on the poetry of Robert Browning.

FRIDAY of last week, All Souls' Day, was marked by a commemoration in Canterbury Cathedral of the three-hundredth anniversary of the death of that great Elizabethan Churchman, Richard Hooker, author of the "Ecclesiastical Polity." Hooker was for seven years Master of the Temple, where his championship of "pure Canterbury," as against the Calvinism of Geneva, led to the production of his famous work, which is a classic not only to Churchmen, but to all Englishmen who love their language in its noblest form. Towards the close of his life Hooker held the living of Bishopsbourne, near Canterbury, and it was there he died.

MR. E. H. COYSH, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, has recently heard from Mr. B. Nagarkar, who writes from Hyderabad:—"I am grateful to you for THE INQUIRER that you have been sending me for some months; it helps me to be in touch with what is going on in England. . . . After my perusal of the paper, I send it to the local reading-room, where it is read by at least seventy-five people. You have doubtless heard of the good work that Mr. Fletcher Williams has been doing in Calcutta and in the North. It must be highly gratifying to his friends in England to hear of his great success in this country, and of the hearty appreciation he meets with wherever he goes."

PROFESSOR CHARLES CARROLL EVERETT, whose death we briefly recorded last week, was a graduate of Bowdoin College, Maine, and after completing his course there, he studied for three years in Germany. Returning to Bowdoin, he became librarian of the college and teacher of modern languages. The note in the Christian World, from which we quoted last week, spoke of Everett as having been subsequently minister of the Independent Congregational Church at Bangor, Maine, but a memorial notice in the Christian Register of Oct. 25 says that it was the Unitarian Church at that place to which he ministered for ten years, and after he had been obliged on account of heresy to quit his chair at Bowdoin, and had taken a further course of study at Harvard Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass. From Bangor he returned to Cambridge, where he became professor of theology, and later also Dean of the Divinity School. "As a theologian," says the writer in the Christian Register, "he was unsurpassed in America."

We count it no exaggeration to say that taking into account all the qualities and attainments which go to the making of a theologian of the first class, he had no equal. No thought of God can be adequate, and no statement can be final; but that which made him great among his fellows was the elevation of his own thought, the purity of his sentiment, and his freedom from artificial limitations, whether traditional or scientific, combined with a rare insight into the thoughts of other men, and into the meaning of creeds alien or inferior to his own.

The same writer says of Dr. Everett that he had in many ways to bear the burden of physical incapacity, and during the more than thirty years of his service at Cambridge probably never knew what it was to have a day of perfect health.

But, because he went steadily on his way with unfaltering will and imperturbable good humour, the weakness of his body became serenity of mind and strength of spirit. Moreover, this physical limitation caused him to say of his own proper work, "This one thing will I do." Unhasting, unresting, he went on his way, making each year a deeper impression as a thinker, a teacher, a man of inclusive thought and broad sympathies.

The Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, D.D., speaking in a memorial sermon of Dr. Everett, said that they had learnt from him that perfect freedom of thought was favourable to the most exalted piety. The surprise men felt in listening to him was at the untrammelled movement of his mind. He was a sceptic in the true sense of looking at things from every side. It was not in logic, said Dr. Crothers, that he found what binds us to God and truth. He knew that the eternal realities must transcend all our theories. "He was not merely a lover of wisdom: he was one who taught to all the wisdom that is in love."

AN interesting illustration of religious catholicity in relation to people who have done good work occurred in Blackpool at the opening meeting of the third session of the Literary and Scientific Society. The society was practically established by the late Mrs. Binns, who induced the Mayor, a Roman Catholic, to call a public meeting in the Town Hall, in order to make a beginning, independent of sectarian and political parties. On Monday evening the President, the Rev. S. Y. B. Bradshaw, vicar of Holy Trinity Church, moved a resolution of condolence with the Rev. W. Binns, and of regret at the irreparable loss which the society had sustained in the lamented death of Mrs. Binns. This was seconded by Mr. Loftos (Town Clerk), and supported by Mr. W. C. Thompson (Chairman of the School Board), and Mrs. Ashworth (one of the Poor Law Guardians). The three gentlemen are members of the Church of England and the lady is a Congregationalist. The resolution was unanimously agreed to in reverent silence. A paper on Browning by Mrs. Binns is printed in the proceedings of the second session of the society.

IN this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, the Rev. C. Hargrove publishes the sermon on "Unitarian Freedom," preached at the recent autumnal meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Sheffield, on the occasion of the Bicentenary of Upper Chapel. The full summary which we published at the time may have led many of our readers to wish to possess the whole sermon. It may be had for 1½d., by post, from Mr. Charles Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde-park, Leeds.

A NOBLE TRADITION.

ENTERING upon his ministry at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, on Aug. 5, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas preached a sermon on "Traditions and their Obligations," which has since been published by request of the Wardens. Having referred to the history of the High Pavement Society, Mr. Thomas spoke as follows:—

To you all of it may be familiar and commonplace; to me it came with all the force of a historic romance, even of a fresh inspiration. It seemed a story full of the sturdy strength of the finest of the old Puritans, adorned with all that is noblest in the traditions of our broad and liberal Nonconformity. If the superior man of letters had been acquainted with the richness and culture of the founders of such religious societies as this, I cannot but think we should have been spared the elegant sneer at the "dissidence of dissent" and "the Protestantism of Protestants." And when we look back upon the true apostolic succession of men who have occupied the pulpit and the pews of this church, we must surely feel that we have the support of a tradition of piety, of scholarship, of good citizenship, of practical benevolence and good works, in exchange for which we would wisely hesitate to accept the more conspicuous but doubtful advantages of a higher ecclesiastical dignity. A pulpit that has been occupied by men like Whitlock, Reynolds, Barrett, Doddridge, Samuel Taylor Coleridge has associations that must at once inspire and humble every preacher that stands here. And a congregation that has included so many men and women distinguished for their piety and philanthropy, for their active public and private life, must surely possess a prevailing spirit of earnestness and enthusiasm for righteousness which would necessarily do good to all who come into contact with it. If the good name of a family or the reputation of a commercial house means anything, if the spirit of a great English public school can mould and fashion successive generations of schoolboys into true English gentlemen, if the brave record of a regiment can nerve soldiers in battle, much more, surely, should the magnificent traditions of a Christian congregation prove powerful and precious to the best life of all its members.

Our forefathers' systems of theology may have had their day and ceased to be, but their piety, their fearless love of truth and liberty, their loyalty to conviction in the teeth of the most cruel persecution, their unselfish doing of good works, their whole-hearted devotion to this society of worshippers—in a word, their Spirit of Life is our inheritance to-day, an inheritance which we should strive to cultivate and enrich, so that we can give a just account thereof to our children and our children's children. But it is in the power of an inheritor to depreciate and squander the estate and trade upon the unsullied name of his ancestors; and a congregation also may become indifferent to its best traditions and cease from effort even while referring to its dead saints. The church that merely rests in the pride of its traditions is doomed: it must accept them as a privilege, discharge the obligations that come with them, and hand them on to posterity revived, ennobled and glorified.

Let us then, with the beginning of a new ministry, renew our youth, revive our congregational activity and consecrate ourselves afresh to God and all goodness. And in the words of this epistle, let me beg you "not to forsake the assembling of yourselves together." Even though sermons should prove dull and the service uninspiring, still come with your own inspiration to help us and lift us up by the power of your own religious life. If you do not need us yet we need you,—your personal presence and the contagion of your spiritual life. To absent yourselves unnecessarily is to withhold moral and religious sustenance from our congregational life, to impoverish the Church and weaken the power of its testimony.

THE POWER OF ITS TESTIMONY! That, after all, is the great thing; that our lives bear witness to the great ideals of Christ, that we show to the despairing the Hope of the World, and to the cynical and sceptical the great worth of life; that in the midst of perplexity and difficulty we remain a worshipping praying people; that we bring to the doubting, not a mere argument for the intellect, but a living conviction for the soul; that we prove "by demonstration of the spirit" not merely by logic, that our religion can be a power of God unto salvation for all such as unfeignedly believe and accept it. We have as our possession truths and ideals for which thousands are to-day hungering; souls are crying out for our sympathy and encouragement. Moreover, we have our own spirits to nourish; we have God and man to serve, we have traditions for self-sacrifice and devotion to principle to maintain. The men who founded and worshipped in this Society though dead, yet speak to us. "Therefore, let us also, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of our Faith."

MY REQUEST.

AMONG thy gifted workers, Lord, I ask no place.
I only crave the blessing of thy loving grace.
Content am I that other hands
More skilled than mine
Should bind the sheaves in distant lands
And tend thy vine.
Let other lips than mine, O Lord, proclaim thy cause,
And give to greater minds the knowledge of thy laws.

But yet some little wayside path I'll gladly tread,
And with thy humble children break my daily bread.
I have no skill to win the strife
For rank and fame.
The busy thoroughfare of life
Calls not my name.
So, while my place in the great world I cannot see,
I am content if needy hearts make room for me.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

V.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (III.)

WHEN we come to ask what has been the history of liberalism in the English Church since the year 1800, we are likely to be puzzled by an apparent inconsistency in current popular criticism of the Church. We frequently hear it said, in any society which is not exclusively Anglican, that the attitude of the Church towards other religious bodies was never so illiberal as it is now. On the other hand we are often assured that liberal opinions have spread far and wide among the clergy, and that the adjustment between conscience and the formularies is, to many of them, a Herculean task.

The word "liberal" may in fact be used in more than one sense. We are so accustomed to associate Unitarian opinions (I define my use of the word below) with a spiritual conception of the Church, and with a practical willingness to live in brotherhood with all earnest worshippers, that we apply the term "liberalism" indiscriminately to all these three states of consciousness. It happens, however, that each of the three has had its own separate history in the Church of England during the century.

The sciences of Biblical archæology and literary criticism have made enormous progress in the last hundred years, and certain results have been reached which may be spoken of as established. They have a very high degree of probability; as high, for instance, as that which belongs to the existence of the planet Neptune. Scientifically speaking, these results can no longer be ignored, except in a spirit of perversity, and they can only be assailed in the same sense and by the same method as any other established scientific theory, such as that of the rotundity of the earth. There is, moreover, a kind of character which impels its owner to unify his beliefs; he cannot rest easy in the knowledge that any one of his dogmas is inconsistent with an established scientific doctrine; he is morally forced to examine the evidence for that doctrine on his own account, and after he has been led by intellectual processes to accept it as true he must needs bring his theological beliefs into accord with it. Such a character I call, for present purposes, Unitarian, and the reformed theological opinions—which necessarily have at any one time a general similarity—I denote by the same word.

Returning to the threefold use of the term "liberalism," I speak first of the liberal conception of the Church as a society purely spiritual, whose limits, if indeed they are narrower than those of humanity, can be known only to God. Such a conception was logically involved in the Evangelicalism of the early decades; it was openly declared by Arnold and his school. Both of these parties regarded the visible Church as a (doubtless venerable but nevertheless) merely human organisation. On the other hand, this idea was utterly repugnant to the Tractarians, and is so no less to their Anglo-Catholic successors. Whatever verbal distinctions they may draw, the clergy of the now dominant party, when they speak of the Church, mean a Church visible, with definite outlines, with a divinely appointed hierarchy. The ministers of this Church are the sole repositories of sacramental power; none but they can claim the divine sanction for their ministry. The typical High Church curate actually teaches that it is a sin to worship God, except in the services which he and his fellows appoint. He boldly accuses of the deadly sin of schism all who worship in dissenting chapels. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that family prayers in a Nonconformist household are an offence against the will of God.

Such being the overt teaching of the chief party in the Church, we should expect to find, as its natural corollary, a practical unwillingness to join in common work with dissenters. Happily this, however, is not the case. There never was a time, since dissent began, when men of all religions met together so freely in all kind of philanthropic labour, as they meet to-day. There is doubtless much ecclesiastical snobbery. The episcopal clergyman looks down on his dissenting brethren. But this, I believe, has little to do with his priestly pride: it is a social disease, a relic of the old Erastianism. He plumes himself not so much on being in valid orders as on belonging to the Established Church. And since he is commonly a gentleman he dissembles his sense of superiority, and treats the mere dissenting preacher as an equal. On Boards of Guardians, School Boards, District Councils, Hospital Sunday Committees, Temperance Committees, and the like, there is abundance of fraternity between Church and Chapel. From ordinary social life religious distinctions have practically disappeared.

All this is due in great part to the abolition of dissenters' disabilities. When the best men at the Universities, in Parliament, on the Bench are as often as not dissenters, it becomes impossible to treat their dissent as something necessarily degrading. In part, however, it is due to more subtle causes. Underneath the veneer of the Neo-catholicism which overspreads the Church, underneath the adoption of Catholic vestments, the observance of Saints' days, the sacramental teaching, there still lies the old evangelical grain. A very large number of the Anglo-Catholics hold their Catholicism as we hold an acquired tongue. They may learn to speak, write, argue in it with great dexterity; but in moments of mental ease they fall back upon their native English. To change the metaphor, the air which they breathe in England is not that of a Catholic country. The evangelical conception of religion as something resident in the individual soul, rather than the Catholic conception of religion as something embodied in a vast organisation, is that which moves, as we say, "in the air" of this land. The conquest of the Church by the Tractarians resembles the Norman conquest of England. They have changed the surface of things, imposed a new theory of government, and a new court-dialect; they have made, perhaps, as indelible a mark upon religion in England as the invaders made upon our speech and institutions. But there is already at work a process analogous to that which led to the absorption of the Norman element in the English language and ethos. The older faith, which is but overlaid, not supplanted, will quietly assimilate so much of the new as it finds soluble in itself, and discard the rest.

Another reason for free intercourse in public life between the Anglican and dissenting clergy is to be found in the spread of Unitarian ideas. The liberal churchmen of the earlier decades of the century were far removed in their convictions from the Unitarianism of to-day; but most of them had already attained the Unitarian attitude towards scientific truth, and their pupils, by a natural progression, advanced to definitely Unitarian opinions. The history of these liberals within the Church resembles in several points that of the liberal Nonconformists. They have appeared as solitary figures, or in small groups without organisation. They have been denounced by the orthodox. Their influence has spent itself not in the creation of a school or party, but in the diffusion of their ideas among the parties that denounced them. In their number were some who fought in the first ranks, like Dr. Martineau outside the Church, against the encroaching materialism of the age.

When the century began William Paley was still living. His great apologetic work is still a text-book at Cambridge. He was an avowed liberal, a follower of Hoadley. Sydney Smith, who died in the year when Newman went over to Rome, was an earnest advocate of religious equality. So also were Henry Bathurst and Edward Stanley, successively bishops of Norwich, the second of whom is well known to us in the memoirs written by his greater son. Other eminent names among the early liberals are those of Milman, Bishop Watson, Connop Thirlwall, the brothers Hare, and Reginald Heber. The Noetics of Oriel have already been mentioned. They included the provost, Copleston; Richard Whately, another great apologist, and a strong liberal; Thomas Arnold, whose inclusion scheme aptly exhibits the nature and limits of his liberalism; Blanco White; and R. D. Hampden, the most liberal of them all. Hampden's Bampton Lectures on the Scholastic Philosophy adopt principles which must necessarily lead to Unitarianism; he advocated the relaxation of subscription to the Articles in a sense which would have admitted Unitarians into the Universities; his appointment as Regius Professor of Divinity evoked a strong Tractarian protest, and he was deprived, through Newman's influence, of some of the normal academic privileges of his post. At Cambridge, a little later, another small group of liberals appeared, among whom F. Denison Maurice, Charles Kingsley and John Sterling became the most renowned. Though each of these laid greater stress on character than on belief, and each departed in some respects from the doctrines held by either party in the Church, none of them can be called Unitarian. Maurice died in 1872, Kingsley in 1875. Returning to Oxford we find there, in Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, the best and most advanced type of liberal which the Church of England has yet seen. A pupil of Arnold, one who far excelled his master in scholarship and literary power, he carried out Arnold's principles to their logical issue. If he had devised an inclusion scheme we may be sure that neither Romanists nor Unitarians would have been shut out of it. His own religious views, though always expressed in terms which avoided offence, were such as may be heard from Unitarian pulpits. If there was one man in England from whom he differed at all points of opinion, that man was W. G. Ward; yet when Ward's degradation was being pressed on Convocation Stanley was indefatigable in his efforts on Ward's behalf. The peroration of Ward's speech in his own defence was written for him by Stanley. The end which Stanley steadily pursued throughout his life was the reform of the Church, as it is called in a famous phrase, "from within." The means to be employed were the relaxation of the terms of subscription (which he achieved), the employment of old dogmatic phrases, such as "the blood of Christ," in a new and more rational, if less obvious sense, and the gradual education of both clergy and laity to a point at which the formularies might, with general consent, be revised. In these aims he had the sympathy of other Oxford men, such as Benjamin Jowett and Mark Pattison. Jowett's Unitarianism made him the object of a somewhat petty persecution by Dr. Pusey, who for several years prevented the payment to him of an adequate stipend as Professor of Greek. The most prominent laymen of this school were perhaps Matthew Arnold and T. H. Green.

Between the years 1860 and 1870 occurred a series of judicial decisions which may be said to justify, on the legal side, the acceptance by Unitarians of Anglican orders. "Essays and Reviews" was published in 1860. Jowett and Mark Pattison, as well as the present Archbishop of Canterbury, contributed papers, but the only articles which were attacked in court were those of Dr. Rowland Williams on Bunsen's Biblical Researches and H. B. Wilson on the National Church. In each case the point of attack was the teaching that the Bible is not the Word of God. The essayists were condemned in the Court of Arches, but were acquitted by the Privy Council. The condemnation of the book by the Convocation of Canterbury was but a brutum fulmen. I have already spoken of the Gorham case. The long and involved case of Bishop Colenso led in the end to two important decisions. In the first place it was laid down that the Church of England in the Colonies is a voluntary institution. The effect of this is to concentrate the government of the whole Anglican communion at Lambeth, and to make the Archbishop of Canterbury the head of a world-wide organisation. Secondly, it was decided that no man can be ejected from the English Church ministry, on grounds of doctrine, who holds that the Bible contains a revelation of God, and that in that sense it is sufficient unto salvation.

Colenso was violently attacked on all sides. Stanley, always heroic in defence, was almost alone in his championship of this dangerous heretic. About thirty years later a band of known High Churchmen put forth a book of essays in which the principles for which Colenso pleaded are calmly conceded; but nobody has attempted to prosecute the authors of "Lux Mundi" for heresy. It is a sign that the critical position—the Unitarian position—is accepted by the Church so far as the Old Testament is concerned. How long will it be before the same concession is made with regard to the New Testament?

Even this may come sooner than we look for it. The clergy of the English Church number far more Unitarians among them than are to be found in the Unitarian ministry. It is true they are not, as a rule, very ready to proclaim their convictions, except to safe ears. They resemble an ill-disciplined freemasonry, a secret society, whose secret is half an open one, the members of which are as eager to conceal their membership from the profane as to reveal it to the initiate. And this is not unnatural. When we remember that a Unitarian in English orders is bound by his office to state frequently in public that he believes what, in fact, he does not believe, we can easily understand that the discovery of his Unitarianism would subject him to unpleasant suspicions. He can doubtless justify to his own conscience, which alone has jurisdiction, the ground he takes; but it is one which is not intelligible to a blunt mind. Hence it comes about that the diffusion of Unitarian views among the clergy goes on in secret. But a day may come, who knows how soon, when the liberal clergy will find their advantage in proclaiming their liberalism. Already there are prognostics of such a day. A journal of liberal theology, the Church Gazette, is boldly published as the organ of the "broad" clergy. When that day dawns, may it waken the church to a new life, which will add to her manifold graces that which she yet lacks, an all-embracing charity.

LITERATURE.

THEODORE PARKER'S EXPERIENCE AS A MINISTER.*

ON the New Year's Sunday of 1859 Theodore Parker preached for the last time to his congregation in the Music Hall, Boston. On the following Sunday, Jan. 9, he was too ill to preach, and sent a touching little note instead, telling his friends that he had meant to preach on "The Religion of Jesus, and the Christianity of the Church; or, the Superiority of Good-will to Man over Theological Fancies." He begged them not to forget their usual contribution for the poor, and concluded: "May we do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God, and his blessing will be upon us here and hereafter; for his infinite love is with us for ever and ever."

Parker was dying of consumption. As soon as possible he sailed for the West Indies, and thence in May for Europe, and wintered in Rome. In the following May he died at Florence. While he was still at Santa Cruz he wrote and sent back to his Boston congregation a long letter (it makes a little book of not far from 40,000 words), which was completed and dated April 19, 1859, and is, in fact, an autobiography of his ministerial life. This, together with the affectionate letters which passed between Parker and his congregation, was published in Boston, and at once republished by Mr. Whitfield in this country. It has long been out of print, and we are now indebted to Miss Emily Sharpe for a reprint of the greater part of Parker's letter. The preliminary letters and perhaps a fifth of the autobiography are omitted, as containing, in the editor's view, "matters temporary and not needful for publication"; but we confess that we should have been still more grateful for a reprint of the whole. In a brief Preface, Miss Sharpe writes:—

> Theodore Parker's clear view of the generous side of human nature, and his unwavering conviction that the thought of God is an inseparable part of man's nature, has been an inspiration to many, and ought not to be lost to us.

This reprint will undoubtedly be useful in calling fresh attention to Parker; but as a personal record we cannot help thinking that it would have been more attractive, as it would certainly have had more historical value, if reproduced entire.

The opening pages, which were introductory, are omitted without any indication of the fact; but in nearly every other instance throughout the book, where sentences or whole pages are left out, marks of omission are printed. One of the longest passages left out simply recalls to his hearers a number of congregational activities, and there are other omissions of little consequence; but from the autobiographical point of view it seems a pity to have left out a number of references to the Unitarians of that day, although the judgments they contain may not seem to be altogether just. Of the inspiration he received from Channing, and of the few other Unitarian ministers in Boston who were brave and charitable enough to show him sympathy in the days of vehement controversy, Parker speaks very warmly; but he naturally felt very bitterly the treatment he received at the hands of the Boston Unitarians as a whole. His impression of the quality of their religious life he gives in a passage which Miss Sharpe omits. Having acknowledged that all the great moral and philanthropic movements in Massachusetts between 1800 and 1840 had been chiefly begun and conducted by Unitarians, and that in the Anti-Slavery movement many Unitarians—"even ministers, a timid race"—had taken an active and influential part, he yet feels that, in spite of their great practical excellence, there is something lacking. (To what he says here and elsewhere Channing is always the great exception.)

> I thought they lacked the deep, internal feeling of piety, which alone could make it lasting: certainly they had not that most joyous of all delights. This fact seemed clear in their sermons, their prayers, and even in the hymns they made, borrowed, or "adapted." Most powerfully preaching to the understanding, the conscience, and the will, the cry was ever, "Duty, Duty! Work, Work!" They failed to address with equal power the Soul, and did not also shout, "Joy, Joy! Delight, Delight!" "Rejoice in God always, and again I say unto you, rejoice!" Their vessels were full of water: it was all laboriously pumped up from deep wells; it did not gush out, leaping from the great Spring, that is indeed on the surface of the sloping ground, feeding the little streams that run among the hills, and both quenching the wild asses' thirst and watering also the meadows newly mown, but which yet comes from the Rock of Ages, and is pressed out by the cloud-compelling mountains that rest thereon,—yes, by the gravitation of the earth itself.

Another passage of special autobiographical interest which we regret not to find in the reprint is that which tells how Parker was first called to his ministry in Boston, with the resolution of 1845 :—"Resolved,—That the Rev. Theodore Parker shall have a chance to be heard in Boston."

* "Theodore Parker's Experience as a Minister, with some Account of his Early Life and Education for the Ministry: contained in a Letter from Him to the Members of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston." Unitarian Christian Publishing Office, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C. 1s.

We note that Miss Sharpe twice omits that characteristic expression of Parker's feeling, in which he speaks of God as "Mother" as well as Father, but in another passage it is retained. When contrasting his own doctrine with the current theology of his day, he says that they, with the Devil and total depravity, "teach their children to distrust the Infinite Perfection, which is Nature's God, dear Father and Mother to all that is." Of the use of this expression, with which we are familiar in Parker's prayers, the late Rev. J. H. Thom spoke (in a note to his article on Parker in the first volume of the Theological Review) as not only "bad taste," but "defect in spiritual insight and judgment"; and he added: "Not the Trinity only, the sinless Mother too, as a fourth Person in the Godhead, would be required, if 'Our Father who art in heaven' is not enough to express the fulness of Love as of Holiness." Parker, in one of the omitted passages, says he uses it "to express more sensibly the quality of tender and unselfish Love, which mankind associates more with Mother than aught else beside." It is the use of the two names together that appears to us chiefly objectionable, but one seems to understand Parker's feeling better, when one meets with such a passage as the following, in a letter written to one of his closest friends very soon after his final break-down, while he still refused to despair of himself :—

It does seem to me I shall have time left to finish certain pieces of work. But I will not complain of the dear Mother (who long ago admonished me that I must not cherish long hopes in a short world) if the kind Hand that brought me here shall also soon take me away to that world "which eye hath not seen," &c. You and I have had many a good time together; and I hoped we should enjoy many more. Indeed, I laid out my life to work publicly and hard till sixty, and then have a quiet afternoon till eighty for getting in my hay; but if my hour strikes at forty-eight, let not you nor me complain.

The hour did strike before Parker was fifty, and no one can wonder at it, remembering his inherited constitution, and the tremendous pressure at which he worked. This letter of autobiography gives one towards the close some conception of it. After an account of his early determination and his education for the ministry, Parker tells of his early experiences, and the conflict which arose between himself and the "orthodox" Unitarianism of that day. He describes the principles of his own teaching, as of "Absolute or Natural Religion," with its faith in the infinite perfection of God and the adequacy of man for all his functions; his conception of the Bible as a venerable literature; and his abandonment of belief in the miraculous as usually understood. He then shows how this religion was applied to the practical questions of the day, and how in opposition to unnatural mysticism on the one hand and ecclesiastical ritualism on the other, he pleaded for a normal development of religious feeling, and its direction to the homely duties of common life. He enumerates fully the great evils that he attacked, and in speaking of slavery tells of how he met the infamous Fugitive Slave Law.

Then I preached against slavery as never before, and defied the impudent statute, whereto you happily said Amen by the first clapping of hands which for years had welcomed a sermon in Boston; how could you help the natural indecorum?

And, lastly, he speaks of his attack on the errors of Ecclesiastical Theology, as having been most persistent, because "they are the most fatal mischiefs in the land." In this section occurs the following passage, telling of his own position :—

To me the name of Christianity is most exceeding dear, significant of so great a man, and of such natural emotions, ideas and actions as are of priceless value to mankind. I know well the errors, also, of the doubters and deniers, who in all ages have waged war against the superstitious theology of their times, and pulled down what they could not replace with better. I have not sat in the seat of the scornful; and while I warned men against the snare of the priest, I would not suffer them to fall into the mocker's pit. I have taken exquisite delight in the grand words of the Bible, putting it before all other sacred literature of the whole ancient world: to me it is more dear when I regard them not as the miracles of God, but as the work of earnest men, who did their uttermost with holy heart. I love to read the great truths of religion set forth in the magnificent poetry of Psalmist and Prophet, and the humane lessons of the Hebrew peasant, who summed up the Prophets and the Law in one word Love, and set forth man's daily duties in such true and simple speech! As a master, the Bible were a tyrant; as a help, I have not time to tell its worth; nor need I now, for my public and private teachings sufficiently abound in such attempts. But yet, to me the great men of the Bible are worth more than all their words; he that was greater than the Temple, whose soul burst out its walls, is also greater than the Testament, but yet no master over you or me, however humble men! In theological matters, my preaching has been positive much more than negative, controversial only to create; I have tried to set forth the truths of Natural Religion, gathered from the world of matter and of spirit; I rely on these great ideas as the chief means for exciting the religious feelings, and promoting religious deeds; I have destroyed only what seemed pernicious, and that I might build a better structure in its place.

The letter ends with earnest and affectionate exhortations to his friends, in which he urges them to let no fondness for himself blind their eyes to errors "which may be in my doctrine, which must be in my life." For himself he feels that he has just begun to learn, and they must not stop where he left them. "Mortal, or entered on Immortal Life, still let me be your minister to serve, never your master to hinder or command." And so he leaves them with a final benediction.

Precious, indeed, must have been such a letter to those friends who were never to see the writer's face again. By many others, who have owed much to his teaching and inspiration it must still be treasured, as coming out of the heart of a brave and faithful man.

SHORT NOTICES.

Pethau Newydd a Hen (i.e., Things New and Old).—This is a Welsh volume of essays and papers from the pen of Mr. D. Delta Evans, South Tottenham, and in its way may be considered as unique a work as has ever been issued from the press, having been, as we are told in the Preface, "written, set up, printed, folded, bound, and sent on its mission by one and the same pair of hands." It is a handsome volume of 260 pages, printed on antique paper, neatly bound in cloth, gilt lettered, with portrait of the author prefixed. The topics are of an ethical, literary, and critical nature, such as Character Building, The Fate of the Welsh Language, Public Worship, The Proverbs of Wales and their Influence on the National Character, The Sacred Songs of Wales, Teaching with Authority, Jesus as a Teacher, with many more of national interest. The language difficulty will doubtless act prejudicially on the views of the general reader, but for this very reason the work, which we strongly recommend, ought to appeal with double force to the patriotic instinct of such bi-lingual readers as can understand and appreciate it. Copies may be obtained (post free for 3s. 6d.) from the author, 59, Abbotsford-avenue, South Tottenham, London.—R. J. J.

The Life of Dante, by the late E. H. Plumtre, D.D., Dean of Wells, has been added as a sixth volume to the charming edition of the Dean's translation of Dante's works published last year. This edition of the Life is edited by Mr. A. J. Butler, who in a prefatory note says that in the light of fresh knowledge gained by the investigations of the fourteen years which have elapsed since its first publication, it has been deemed well to prune down a little the somewhat exuberant conjecture in which the Dean indulged, and that while a good deal is left which the editor is by no means prepared to endorse, it is hoped that nothing remains which research has shown to be demonstrably incorrect. The frontispiece is a reproduction of Henry Holiday's picture, "Dante and Beatrice," in the Liverpool Art Gallery. (Isbister and Co. 2s. 6d. net).

The Divine Ordination of Death, from a discourse by Dr. Southwood Smith, is a timely re-issue of the substantive part of a sermon of consolation preached by the distinguished author at Bridport in 1820. An interesting biographical note is prefixed to the sermon, which tells how Southwood Smith, who was born in Somerset, 1788, had been intended for the Orthodox Dissenting Ministry, but, having become a Unitarian, left the Bristol (Baptist) College and went to Edinburgh to study medicine, and from 1816 to 1820 was Unitarian minister at Yeovil, and at the same time practised as a physician. In 1824 he was appointed physician to the London Fever Hospital, and from that time was devoted to the work by which he is chiefly remembered, as a pioneer in Sanitary Reform. Dr. Southwood Smith's earliest work, "Illustrations of the Divine Government," appeared in 1814, his "Philosophy of Health" in 1834, on a new edition of which he was engaged at the time of his death, in 1861. (Philip Green. 4d. net.)

Hymns of Modern Thought with Music is a collection of 206 pieces, "which contain no theological dogma, but are exclusively concerned with the spiritual aspirations of men in regard to daily life, character, and conduct." That being the ideal of the book, from which all thought of God is studiously eliminated, "Hymn" seems hardly the title under which its contents should be gathered. Among the verses here set to music we find Tennyson's "Ring out, wild bells," Clough's "It fortifies my soul to know, that though I perish Truth is so," and the last piece is George Eliot's "Choir Invisible," as an anthem; but the general level of the moral songs, of which the book chiefly consists, does not rise above the level of Bonar's "He liveth long, who liveth well." From the musical point of view the collection seems to us of more value. Not quite half of the tunes appear in it for the first time. More than fifty are by Miss E. J. Troup, to whom we are also indebted for the beautiful setting of George Eliot's lines. A number of her tunes, and others which are new, will, if we are not mistaken, be found worthy of attention. (Houghton and Co., Music Publishers, 39, Great Marlborough-street, W. 3s.)

Spiritual Perspective and other Sermons, by the late Charles John Perry, B.A., minister of Hope-street, Church, Liverpool, is the little volume of thirteen sermons, edited by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and first published in 1885. They are genuine sermons, simple, practical and helpful, which have already been widely appreciated; they are good for home reading, for Postal Mission work, or for reading at service, where that is desired, and a new edition is very welcome. (Philip Green. 1s. 6d.).

THE most generally attractive article in the September number of the New World will undoubtedly be that on "The Temptation of Mr. Bulstrode—a Study of the Subconscious Self," by Mrs. Julia A. Gulliver, who in December, 1895, contributed a similar article on "Tito Melema." The analysis is searching, and is illustrated in a most interesting manner by a parallel drawn between the personal experience, the narrow view of religion, the self-deception and the final conviction of Bulstrode, and the development of the conceptions of God and sin in the Hebrew race.

The Israelites were slow to realise that sin was of such a nature as to isolate them from their God. They believed that Yahweh and the nation were bound in the bundle of life together, and that it was as much for his interest as for theirs to preserve them in prosperity. How mistaken they were the whole company of the prophets, from Elijah down to Jeremiah, tried in vain to show, and only the political extinction of their nation finally brought it home to them.

The parallel is worked out to the end, when Bulstrode sees in his wife's suffering in the hour of his disgrace, and her love which will not desert him, something of that ideal which the Second Isaiah so wonderfully pictured, and which leads us beyond the circle of human affection to the eternal and all-embracing Love.

The number opens with an article by Professor James Seth, of Edinburgh, on "Recent Gifford Lectures and the Philosophy of Theism," which shows what has been the gain to religion as opposed to "Naturalism" from the lectures, especially of Professors Campbell Fraser and James Ward. "Naturalism and its Results" is the subject of a helpful article by Professor C. C. Everett. Mr. Alfred W. Benn writes on "What is Agnosticism?" and Professor W. A. Brown on "Professor Ladd's Theory of Reality," showing how this leads up to the supreme reality of God.

The Absolute is neither identical with the world, nor unrelated to the world. It is rather the source and ground of all the infinity of relations which the world discloses. So far from being the most abstract of conceptions, as it has often been conceived to be, it is really the most concrete. Its activities, as disclosed in its relations with things and selves, are infinitely various. Indeed, it is our very inability to grasp it perfectly which gives rise to the false impression of its abstractness. Immanent in the world, it is the seed and spring of all that is. Whenever we touch reality we touch God. Of all the objects in the world He is the subject. No relatively independent centre of self-activity which has not its ground in His Will; no form, no law, no ideal end which the world discloses, but is a realisation of His idea. In such a statement of monistic philosophy, the entire course of Professor Ladd's discussion culminates.

Mr. J. H. Woods, writing on "The Supreme God of the Lowest Races," with reference to Mr. Andrew Lang's dissent from the theory of Spencer and Tylor, thinks that the evidence to be gathered from the present condition of West African races goes to prove that the ghost theory will not hold, that the Supreme God is regarded as the Creator, but that, on the other hand, He is not regarded as a moral being. The remaining articles are by Lieutenant-Commander Calkins on "Spanish Failures in the Philippines," Mr. B. C. Pal on "Religious Life in Modern India," and Professor Orello Cone on "The Synoptic Question," and the number concludes with over forty pages of book reviews.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—A large number of congregations throughout the country have arranged to take a collection on behalf of the Funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on Sunday, Nov. 18. Last year 183 congregations had collections, and the sum of £549 was received. It will be an encouragement to the Committee in their work if this number and amount can be increased this year.

Few people realise how much is done by the Association. During last year no less than 70 congregations were assisted in their good work by grants for one purpose or another amounting to £2,500. From all parts of the country, and indeed from all the corners of the earth, applications for Unitarian literature are received, and nearly 100,000 books and pamphlets were distributed during the year at a considerable expenditure of money.

May I appeal more especially to the ministers to do all they can to let their congregations know about the good work the Association has done, the things that are waiting to be done, and which will be done as soon as larger resources are placed at the disposal of the Committee.

In the event of any sympathisers with the Association being unable to be present on the day the collection is taken, I feel sure the ministers will be glad to receive contributions and add them to the sums collected; and if there are among your readers those who are not connected with any congregations, I shall be pleased to receive and acknowledge any donations or subscriptions that are forwarded to me at Essex Hall.

MR. FRIPP AND UNITARIANISM.

SIR,—I am surprised to find that I am one of "the men of Essex Hall," but can only feel pleasure at being enrolled in such an honourable band. But it is inexcusable for Mr. Fripp to assert that "the men of Essex Hall" are bent on making our Free Churches Unitarian Churches, and compelling those of us who cannot accept Unitarianism to leave their communion." The very name "Essex Hall," and the free trust deed supporting it, and the noble history behind it, repel the unwarrantable aspersion; and nothing in the history of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in recent years gives the slightest colour to such a charge. It is an association of individuals, not of churches; and there is no bigotry in men and women of like mind uniting in a voluntary society to spread those religious views in which they are most deeply interested. Our churches have not fought for two hundred years against anything of the kind: they have very properly fought, and successfully, against the imposition of creeds as a test of religious fellowship. A Trinitarian Association would have a perfect right to influence the members of free congregations, to make grants to some Free Churches, and withhold them from others without incurring a charge of being a set of sectarian bigots, bent on making our Free Churches Trinitarian Churches.

Need I say that the other "men of Essex Hall"—whoever they may be—are in no way chargeable with what I said at Newcastle. For that utterance I take sole responsibility, and there is not a word which I would unsay—not even that "most unfortunate remark," as you, Sir, characterise my expression of wonder whether Mr. Fripp would not feel himself more at home in the Church of England than with us. Think of the situation. Mr. Fripp is continually abusing Unitarianism; he goes out of his way in season and out of season to tell Unitarians that he regards them as narrow-minded dogmatists, though the congregations to which he ministers are mainly composed of Unitarians; he no longer finds ground of serious objection against the doctrine of the Trinity, for he thinks there is profound truth underlying it; he has introduced into his methods of worship a high ritual which to many people suggests sacerdotalism; he has cast away many of the vital principles of our Puritan forefathers. Holding such views as he does, would he have gone out with the noble Two Thousand in 1662? What more natural than for him to join this Church, with whose creed and ritual he would probably feel more at home, instead of remaining among uncongenial companions and hampering associations and hated dogmatisms in the group of churches where Unitarians hold the preponderating influence?

It is ridiculous for Mr. Fripp to assume the air of a martyr, and talk of "the new heresy," as though anyone had attempted or desired to drive him out of fellowship. He did not do me the justice to quote the first part of the sentence whose latter portion he so readily seized on. Before expressing my wonder that he should care to stay with us, I said:—"Certainly, no free church would ever think of driving out an honest thinker." It would almost seem as if Mr. Fripp wanted to find an excuse for saying he was being driven out of our ranks, so eager is he to fasten the name "heretic" on himself. As a matter of fact, Unitarians have been very patient with him under much provocation; they have never hinted to him that he has no right to be where he is, so long as his congregation is satisfied with his position; but they may well be excused, if, trying to put themselves in his place, they express a little surprise that he should care to keep company with the earnest men and women whom he belabours with such unnecessary and unmerited violence. C. J. Street.

Bolton, Nov. 6.

Sir,—I have no wish to add to a barren controversy; but it has occurred to me that should Mr. Fripp be moved to write to you again, it might help to clear his own mind as well as to illuminate the minds of others, if he would kindly point out the differences between Unitarian worship as usually conducted and Free Christian worship. Also if he would state of which he considers the Lord's Prayer to be an example.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Pearl-Oyster.—

From deep down in Southern seas, off the shores of India and among the islands of the Pacific Ocean, a very pretty story comes to us, and a true story too, about a shell-fish and its home; the shell-fish something like our common oyster, and its home something like the chipped and battered double oyster-shell. No wonder its home is so battered and broken, for large companies of this shell-fish settle upon the rocks in deep water and many a storm dashes their shells roughly against the rocky ledges and against each other, breaking and injuring the outer walls of their homes.

But when the shell is opened all is perfectly smooth and silvery within; everywhere there is the same beautiful pearly lining. And there is yet more ornament upon the inner walls of this creature's home; here and there, in small groups, are little solid things shaped like a berry, and covered over, too, with the same bright silvery pearl.

Now these little silvery berries are nothing less than the costly pearl-gems which are made into such beautiful jewellery, and which from very early times indeed have been so greatly prized; and the shell in which they lie is the pearl-oyster, one of the most valuable shells found in the sea.

The pearl-oyster, as I told you, lives among the rocks in deep water; numbers of other creatures are making their homes there too. Now when its shell is open, as it very often is, in order that the owner may obtain food from the surrounding water, some rough little bit of broken shell or pebble, or other tiny thing which may have drifted towards it either from its own large settlement or from the neighbouring colonies of other creatures, is very likely to float into it, destroying at once the comfort and beauty of its home.

How is it, then, do you think, that it is able to keep all so perfectly smooth and bright inside? Yes, many a rough little bit of something does drift in, and once inside the hollow of its shell, it would be very difficult indeed for the oyster with any power that it has to drive it back again into the sea.

But the pearl-oyster possesses one very wonderful power: it is able to cover these tiny bits of whatever they may be very thickly over with the same bright silvery substance which lines the whole of its shell, so changing what was unpleasant and harmful to it into a more beautiful and costly ornament than any other shell can boast of. For these tiny rough substances, covered over so thickly with pearl, are those same little silvery berries on the walls of the oyster's home, the beautiful pearl-gems which, at great risk to their lives, men dive down to the rocky ledges where the oysters live to find.

For long might the oyster have tried to turn out of its shell what was troubling it and spoiling its pretty home, and in the end might not have been able to do so. But the power of changing what was ugly and unpleasant into something bright and beautiful had been given to it.

Perhaps you are thinking that this story sounds very like some fairy-tale in which a beautiful fairy-queen is able, by waving her magic-wand, to change whatever she pleases into silver or gold. But, as I told you at first, it is a true story about the pearl-oyster. And you envy the oyster its magic-like power of changing what is unpleasant into something so bright and beautiful! But do you think that this gift belongs to one of the very low forms of life, and that God's children, made in His likeness, are without it? No, we all of us possess it in same form or other; we can all of us, sometimes, change unpleasant things into bright and beautiful things. And you, children, with your happy sunny faces often possess this gift more richly than grown-up people.

Alice Hincks.

The Ministers' Benevolent Society.—The annual meeting was held in the Vestry of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Oct. 30, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, President, in the chair. The Directors' Report stated that during the year grants had been made to 22 widows, 15 ministers, and the orphan child of a minister. Three beneficiary members had died, one had resigned, and seven new members had been elected, leaving a total of 179 beneficiary members. Several years ago it was necessary to reduce the scale of grants, but now, thanks to Mr. Charles Cochrane's munificent bequest, it has been possible to make an increase.

The following among other kind contributions to the funds have been received during the year:—Mr. Arthur Lupton's Executors £5,000; Miss E. F. Lee (Kinver), £500; Miss Sharpe (London), £100; Mr. Charles Wragg's Executors (Chesterfield), £50; Miss S. Russell's Executors (Birmingham), £25; and Mr. W. G. Harrison (Croydon), £20.

The following table gives a concise summary of the amounts expended in grants by the Society since its formation in 1852:—

From Oct., 1852 to Sept., 1862 £965 in 41 grants.

From Oct., 1862 to Sept., 1872 £4,820 in 141 grants.

From Oct., 1872 to Sept., 1882 £11,732 in 247 grants.

From Oct., 1882 to Sept., 1892 £15,951 in 395 grants.

From Oct., 1892 to Sept., 1900 £10,573 in 264 grants.

A proposal to increase the limit or age for the admission of beneficiary members from 45 to 50 was not seconded, and fell to the ground. A strong appeal was made for a continuance not only of the liberal financial support hitherto given to the Society, but of that interest in its work and well-being, which is essential to the maintenance of the success so far achieved.

I dare to give my pity to some man who seems to live a meagre life. How few things happen in his day! How little light there is in his dark house! How dull the voices are that break his silence! But who am I that I should give him pity? Let me know that it is not what he has, but what he is that makes the poverty or richness of life. It may well be that while I pity him his deeper faith is seeing visions and hearing music in familiar things of which I have no dream. —Phillips Brooks.

OUR IDEAL OF SERVICE.

BY an undesigned coincidence the concluding portion of Professor PEABODY'S noble sermon on "The Church of the Spirit" and Mr. WOOD'S Bicentenary sermon at Sheffield appeared side by side in our issue of last week, and with kindred prophetic power turned our thoughts toward the same ideal of service, in obedience to which our churches would find their deliverance into a richer and more vigorous life.

The task laid upon us, says Mr. WOOD, is to adapt Christianity not only to the new intellectual life of our age, but also to the new conceptions of social obligation ; we must join in the strenuous attempt being made on many sides, "to apply the teaching of JESUS to the problems of social welfare," "to bring the spirit, the character, and the ideas of JESUS into touch with the actualities of life." Our churches must rise to the level of the new ideals and conditions, "mingling the temper of seriousness and CHRIST-like sympathy with the passionate hopes of the new age for a fairer social justice."

And in like manner Professor PEABODY declares that the Church of the Spirit is a ministering church. "By the grace of GOD we have come to a time when the chief interest of the world is outward-looking, generous, self-forgetting. It is the age of the social question ; and the test of the Church, as of all other human organisations, must be found in its contribution to social service." But for this there must be the right motive power. The need is not so much for more channels of social usefulness as for more social wisdom, insight, patience, and power. And from what source, he asks, does that power proceed ? "It springs from the hidden sense of GOD, from the life of idealism, insight, vision, and faith, as the full stream which moves the modern industry flows from its secret source among the quiet hills."

Here, then, is what we need. Not a new declaration of doctrine, but a new persistence of faithful life, a new gladness of self-surrender, poured out in brotherly love. In our Free Churches we are united for the one supreme purpose of the worship of GOD—to be together in His holy presence, to be surrendered to His holy will. But that signifies not merely the exercise of emotion or the right direction of thought, it signifies Life, the true life of the spirit, in communion with the Eternal, the FATHER of all living souls. And the call which comes to us now is to find the fulness of that life in the realising of human brotherhood—in social service.

Nothing could be more futile than the hankering after a creed to give us closer union or new strength. The presence of GOD is not a creed or a dogma, but a spiritual fact. It is found in worship and in that prayer which is the lowly doing of the FATHER'S will, in labour for the welfare of our fellowmen. The truth of GOD will be declared to the world, and brought home with new power to the hearts of men, not by any insistence on a formulated dogma, but by the manifestation of that spirit of prayer and self-surrender, and the practical doing of our FATHER'S will in brotherly love. When that is achieved nobody will be any longer asking for that doubtful instrument, a creed.

Thus looking forward to a better future, and seeking worthily to face the duties of our day, to fully realise the opportunities and do the work of our Free Churches, our whole strength, in humble and persistent effort, must be given to seeking more of the true spirit of prayer, in the hours of worship and in the service of our daily life. Seeking simply to be given up to GOD, always open to the light of His truth, doing His will, we shall know that our churches are secure in the strength of the Eternal, that His truth teacheth inwardly, that His will for us is in the service of mankind, in that spirit of Christian discipleship, in which, with JESUS, we are all children of our FATHER in heaven, and workers for His Kingdom. In such surrender of self-forgetfulness and earnest service we should find the new spring of joy and strength ; we should not even remember those old questions that used to worry us, we should not want to be making any declarations to prove the soundness of our faith or persuade the world at last to believe that we were really Christians ; we should be living, and working, and rejoicing in a new and greater world, with unspeakable thankfulness filling our proper place in the Household of GOD.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

BICENTENARY CELEBRATIONS.

THE Bicentenary of Matthew Henry's Chapel at Chester was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, October 28 and 29. The fine old building has recently been reroofed and otherwise restored at a cost of some £900, towards the balance of which, not yet raised, any profits there may be on the forthcoming History of the Chapel, by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the late minister, are to be devoted.

The commemoration services on Sunday were conducted in the morning by the present minister, the Rev. H. E. Haycock, whose subject was "The Continuity of the Spirit" (Hebrews xi. 39, 40), and in the evening by the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, who took for his text Judges xiv. 14, "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." In the course of his sermon he said Chester was as early as 1551 identified with dissent One preacher on that date was burnt for heresy in the Castle. At the close of the seventeenth century both Independents and Presbyterians were represented there. Matthew Henry would not come until a fair prospect appeared of their unity, and this unity came somewhere near 1700. The Independents cast in their lot with the Presbyterians, and for their accommodation the gallery was built. Ultimately divisions occurred, and even in Henry's time they began to fall away. At last at the end of the eighteenth century they set up for themselves as Congregationalists. Matthew Henry's work was a great and good work—three giant services on Sunday, of teaching and preaching, and many other services to conduct in outlying congregations. A sermon and teaching every day—somewhere ; and besides these and other great parish duties, there was his Commentary, his private studies, and his boarder students. Truly, he ate not the bread of idleness, nor suffered slothfulness to encompass his days. His great book, though of course not sharing the increased light which had since emerged from the then comparative obscurity, was still a book of memorable traits. Written from his heart, as much as from his head, and expressed in the real vernacular of the time, it must have been the means of much real enlightenment to the plain folks of his own time. To speak from his own heart and mind to the hearts and minds of the people about the Holy Word of God, so that they might love it as he did, and know it as it behoved them to know it, was his great object, and who should say but that he nobly did and truly obtained his end ? The very walls and pulpit of that venerable place, said Mr. Gordon, were redolent of his Christian life and presence. As regarded the Unitarians three things had to be said. From Calvinism three main streams of thought had flowed, which together, powerfully moulded the Unitarianism which superseded the sobered Calvinism of Matthew Henry and his successors. First, Calvin would not have any barrier between the living man and the living God. They sufficed for each other. Secondly, in direct relation with God there was liberty. It was for God to govern through heart and soul and mind the child of His creation. Men and their views of God were for God to judge and enforce on men ; not for mere creatures like themselves to arrogate to themselves His sovereign prerogatives. And thirdly, since God was all in all, and in direct relation with man, Jesus became necessarily less than God. In that way emerged the distinctive character of the Unitarian succession. In that way Christ became the great embodiment of suffering humanity —a larger brother and our better self.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

On Monday, Oct. 29, a large and representative public meeting was held in the chapel, presided over by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., President of the B. and F.U.A. and a trustee of the chapel. Amongst those present were the Revs. J. K. Montgomery, Charles Hargrove, H. Enfield Dowson, Dendy Agate, H. D. Roberts, G. A. Payne, J. Morley Mills, W. F. Turland, R. S. Redfern, and H. E. Haycock, Messrs. W. Orrett (treasurer), A. Orrett (secretary), E. Powell, F. Garside, Major Bryan Johnson, W. Long (Warrington), J. Gresty (Whitchurch), and C. M. Holland (Wrexham).

Apologies for absence were announced from the Mayor, the Right Hon. Herbert Gladstone, M.P., Mr. S. Moss, M.P., Sir Thomas and Lady Frost, and a number of friends in Chester and the district, also local ministers of other denominations.

The meeting was opened with hymn and prayer offered by the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, formerly minister of the chapel.

Sir John Brunner offered his hearty congratulations on the change that had been made in that venerable building, not only to those who sat there from Sunday to Sunday, and who lived in the immediate neighbourhood, but to all of them, because that building belonged not merely to the few who lived in Chester, but to all of them, from one end of the country to the other. He had, he said, dreamt on a good many occasions of late of starting a new Reformation. Perhaps the best way to start a Reformation in these days was to introduce a Bill into the House of Commons. What would they think of it if he brought in a Bill for the amendment of the Prayer Book? He wondered how many members of the House of Commons he could get to ballot for the chance of bringing in that Bill? If all the voting were to be by ballot as well as the voting to obtain a place for the Bill, he fancied he should have a good many supporters, because the members of the House of Commons were a good deal more advanced in their opinions than the average constituent, but as there was no hope of voting by ballot there he doubted whether such a Bill would have a chance, though the historians among them would tell them that there had been occasions on which it appeared they were on the edge of such a reformation. Their friends of the Church of England were becoming from opposite directions more and more keenly interested in themselves, and he should be very glad indeed to see them going on thinking about their position. A clergyman who wrote to him a few days ago, taking a new interest in his recovered position as a member of Parliament, asked whether he would support a Bill that had already been brought into the House of Lords by the Bishop of Rochester. One part of that Bill appeared to be to endow the laity with a real voice in the appointment of their pastors, but it was to be limited. It was to be within the limits of Church Order. If that Bill came into the House of Commons and he found this power too restricted, he should feel strongly inclined to move to omit the words "within the limits of Church Order." If only they could endow the laity in every place of worship in the Church of England with absolute, not limited power, to appoint their own pastors, he thought they would have taken a very great step in freedom in religious matters. He rather doubted the authors of this Bill, for the reason that the very clergyman who wrote to him to secure his support hit him very hard a few years ago on account of a declaration of his. Why it happened he did not know, but it came to him as a matter of duty to declare that his religion was comprised in the two great commandments of which it was said by an authority that they were all bound to respect, that on them hung all the law and the prophets. After he had said those commandments bounded and comprised his religion, this rev. gentleman took it upon himself to say in his parish magazine that it was blasphemy. His recommendation of the Bill for the benefit of the Church of England did not therefore come to him as a very sound recommendation. He spoke awhile ago of his dream of a new reformation. Perhaps a better way than bringing a Bill into the House of Commons would be to try and remind their friends of the Church of England what it was they believed, or what it was they officially believed—or believed they believed. He found very few who knew what it was they believed—what it was they officially believed. He was glad to say that his colleague on the present occasion —Mr. Hargrove—had undertaken to assist in that good work by reminding the members of the Church of England what it was they were bound to believe, for he had kindly undertaken to give them a short and popular history of the creeds. If they could persuade the members of the Church of England to read that history they would not only learn what they officially believed, but why they believed it. Their official beliefs had grown from century to century through the operation of what were called church councils, and he believed that just as Luther was cured of his belief in the Catholic Church by going to Rome, it might cure a good many of the people who believed what they were bound to believe, if they only knew why it was they believed. These councils, so far as his reading about them went, were very much like the political caucuses of to-day, where there was considerable intrigue on one side and the other to obtain a majority, and all the things that were down in the creeds to-day were the result of chance majorities at these gatherings. He believed it would be an extremely wholesome thing that these facts should be laid before those who were interested in them, and taken to heart. He had only one other thing to mention. He observed it stated on a printed form before him that the congregation had not yet provided an effective means of heating that building; that final decoration had been compulsorily postponed, and that the brass tablet bearing the names of the ministers existed only in idea. Then followed the remark that the two windows on the north wall on either side of the pulpit should be of stained glass with portraits in the centre of Matthew Henry and Dr. Martineau. The heating apparatus, as a first essential, and the other requirements he thought they would soon provide, but it might be long before they got the windows, which were to be a memento of two beautiful lives, and these Sir John concluded by offering to give to the congregation, an offer which was accepted with hearty applause.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., having referred to the leadership of Sir John Brunner in all that was best and noblest in that part of the country, and especially in the cause of unsectarian education, and also to their happiness in the presence of a venerable ex-minister of that congregation, who at eighty-four seemed one of the youngest men he knew, delivered an address on "Our Spiritual Ancestry." To be present, he said, at the bi-centenary of a chapel founded by Matthew Henry was to be on a pilgrimage. He was a pilgrim to a shrine that was very sacred, and felt himself breathing the sacred air of religious liberty, devotion, and noble self-sacrifice for what was dearer than life. He thought of many of the great claims to reverence of those spiritual ancestors of theirs, and wondered whether they had the grit of their fathers. The chapel of his spiritual forefathers, built in 1708, had not even flags on the floor, there was only the bare earth, and no stove; yet in the old days people tramped there from far and wide. Some of them came ten miles or so from the countryside to worship in that cold damp building, but the warmth of devotion in their hearts enabled them to worship God in spirit and in truth. Another trait was their love of liberty. They went out for conscience sake; they would not be bound down by any Act of Conformity. They went out to be free; and thank God they, their descendants, inherited that liberty. Such was the sacred legacy left them by Matthew Henry and all the great and good men who had gone before them. At that bi-centenary celebration let them remember their self-devotion, their fidelity to conscience, and their love of liberty. Let them pray God for a re-baptism with that self-devotion of their spiritual ancestors.

The Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., delivered an address on "Our Heritage of Freedom," in which he said their history was not to be valued by its length of 200 years. As the wise old Hebrew said, "Old age is not counted by years, nor is a man made venerable by the time he has lived." The question was not what years they could remember, but what work they had done. "Two hundred years!" the Churchman might say, "we have seven or eight hundred years." But what had been done in the seven or eight hundred years, and what had they done in the two? The Church of England had now the same formularies, was bound by the same articles and creeds, as 200 years ago; they boasted that the years passed over their heads bringing no wisdom with them. There was no change; consequently with no change there was no growth. As for themselves, they had "lived" for these 200 years—lived from the beginning right on to now, always open for the free winds of heaven to blow upon them, and never submitting to any fetters, to any word of man who said, "Thus far, and no farther." They had undergone great changes of belief during the past 200 years, and who knew what changes would have taken place when the ter-centenary came to be celebrated? Should they lay the dead hand on their successors and say, "We have come thus far—at last we have attained the truth—go not otherwise than we have gone. Think as we think now—learn no more, for no more is to be learned." If they said so, they were unfaithful to the whole spirit of the past; they were unworthy of the inheritance of that place, and should go from it, and leave others to take their place. The faith and opinions of the generations to be they knew not, but their message to them from the second century was this, "Brothers, teach not as we teach, think not as we think, speak not as we speak, but be true to the Spirit of God and trust Him; teach as God shall teach to you. Speak the truth whatever it shall cost you; think as far as it is given to man to think, the thoughts of God, which are the eternal truth."

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A., giving an address on "Old Principles applied to New Duties," said it seemed to be a parody and caricature of that principle of freedom to which they held first and foremost, to say they would not teach their children what they themselves believed because they did not wish to bias their minds. That was an absolutely mistaken notion. If they valued religion for themselves, if their professed place in the church, whatever it might be, had been a guide and strength to them, if from the worship at which they assembled with others on Sundays they were able to gather strength for the doing of their own work in the world, surely these things, if they were deep and true in their own hearts, could not be of no consequence in connection with the lives of their children. Over and over again in the past they had lost those who would have been with them to-day in all their earnestness and devotion to the faith, because they had said, "We will not influence or bias them, but leave them to grow up and form their own religious convictions for themselves." What happened? Either they drifted into self-satisfied indifference or other churches with stronger faith, more devotion to their professed principles, had come in their way, and with their stronger hearts and wills swept them into the popular churches. It was a serious matter. Like Joseph Priestley, James Martineau, and others, they should make it a steady part of their work to train the young people of their congregations in the knowledge of their history and in devotion to spiritual, practical, earnest religion.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS moved a vote of thanks to the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and to other friends who had contributed to the fund for the restoration of that historic place of worship. He explained that the alterations in the structure had necessitated an outlay of £900. Towards this they had raised £700, but on work actually completed they were £100 in debt.

Mr. W. ORRETT seconded, remarking that the generous response from the Unitarian public throughout the kingdom had been most unexpected by the Committee, and they appreciated it most gratefully.

The motion was carried, after which, on the motion of the Rev. H. E. HAYCOCK, seconded by Major JOHNSON, a vote of thanks was accorded to Principal Gordon, Sir John Brunner, and the other speakers.

Hymn and Benediction brought to a close a most uplifting and memorable gathering.

AMERICAN LETTER.

IT is plain that the visit of Mr. Bowie, Mr. Hargrove, and Mr. and Miss Pritchard to America last spring was not a mistake. Perhaps nothing else in recent years has done so much to help the Unitarians of the two countries to understand each other, and to draw each to the other in closer sympathy. May such visits be frequent in future time.

Perhaps it may not be entirely without interest to the readers of THE INQUIRER to have some brief word as to how work is opening among our American Unitarian Churches this fall.

The great May meeting in Boston was encouraging and stimulating in its immediate effects. Will its lasting effects be equally good? There seems to be some reason to believe that they will. Certainly there are signs of hope, of vigour, and of courage in many directions.

Last year the American Unitarian Association, our national missionary organisation, asked for $75,000 from the churches for missionary expenditure. It got that sum. This year it will ask for more. Of course this means an extension of its work. We were never before so well organised for work, the whole country over, as we are now. Heretofore the Association has had only one general officer in the field—namely, its secretary. From this time on it will have two, its president and its secretary. And besides, it is undertaking to carry out fully a plan which has been in partial operation for some years past, of covering the whole land with a system of district missionary superintendents. One of these has charge of the work in New England; a second in the Middle States and Canada; a third in the Middle West; a fourth on the Pacific Coast; and a fifth (not yet appointed) is to have charge in the South. The men occupying these important places are all men of ability, missionary zeal, and experience; and we may be sure that the weak and struggling churches, as well as the work of planting new societies, will be looked after better than ever before. We are seeing more and more clearly the importance of organisation, if our cause is to grow. Everywhere else men are availing themselves of the power and advantage of organisation; why should not religious workers do the same?

This is the time when many State and local Conferences are being held in various parts of the country. This week there are two national gatherings of importance. One is the annual meeting of our Unitarian Sunday School Society, held at Leominster, near Boston; and the other the biennial session of the Ministers' Institute, held in Worcester, Mass. This Institute brings together from 100 to 150 of our ministers for three days of fellowship and acquaintance, and of study and discussion of great themes connected with the ministerial calling. It is one of the most interesting and valuable of our agencies.

Several events of importance have occurred recently in connection with our cause in Boston. One is the dedication of a fine new church in West Roxbury, one of our most attractive Boston suburbs. This is of especial interest because of the fact that it was here Theodore Parker was pastor before he began his Boston Music Hall movement, which became so famous. The present pastor of the West Roxbury Church is the Rev. John H. Applebee, a young man of marked promise, the son of the Rev. James Kay Applebee, who twenty-five years ago was well known among English Unitarians.

Two of our prominent Boston churches have just settled new pastors. The Rev. Paul R. Frothingham comes from New Bedford to the Arlington-street pulpit, to succeed Mr. Cuckson and Dr. Herford; and Professor Cummings, of the chair of Sociology in Harvard University, comes to be Dr. Hale's associate at the South Congregational Church. Both these accessions to the Boston ministry are strong men, and much is expected from them. The case of Professor Cummings will be watched with rather unusual interest, because his sympathies and tastes are distinctly sociological, rather than theological, and it waits to be seen to what extent training for the chair of a University lecturer affords adequate preparation for the Christian pulpit.

On Oct. 10 the Boston Unitarian Club held its first meeting of the season, at the Hôtel Vendôme. After the dinner was over the chief speakers of the evening were Professor Cummings and Mr. Frothingham. Both spoke earnestly of the value of the Church, and of the great work before the Unitarian body to spiritualise science and lift up humanity.

Our Unitarian household of faith has just suffered two deep bereavements. Last week there died on the same day in Cambridge, the Rev. J. T. R. Nichols, D.D., who for forty-five years was the active pastor, and until his death the pastor emeritus, of the Unitarian Church in Saco, Maine; and the Rev. Charles Carroll Everett, D.D., who for more than thirty years had been Professor of Theology in the Harvard Divinity School, and for many years Dean of the School. Two men could hardly be more unlike. One was the typical minister of his people—a shepherd who knew and loved every member of his flock, and who exercised a guiding influence upon the lives of all. The other was a ripe scholar and a deep thinker, who did somewhat the same work in shaping the thought and the ideals of the present generation of Unitarian ministers in this country that Dr. Martineau did in England. Says the editor of the Christian Register: "As a theologian, he was unsurpassed in America." This is probably no exaggeration. Besides being a great scholar and thinker, he was one of the most modest and lovable of men. Not only the Divinity School, but our whole body will feel deeply his loss.

I must not close without mentioning two notable books, just published, to which all Unitarians both in this country and England should have their attention called. They are the Rev. J. W. Chadwick's "Theodore Parker: Preacher and Reformer," and the Rev. A. W. Jackson's "James Martineau: A Biography and a Study." To say that a book is written by Mr. Chadwick is to say that it is brilliant. It would be hard to conceive a more graphic and masterly portrayal of a great life than he has given us in this study of Parker. The book has the merit of being moderate in size. Parker was a heroic character, but far too much in advance of his time to be generally understood or appreciated by the great mass of his contemporaries. But the world is fast coming up with him. We shall be surprised if this book of Mr. Chadwick's is not widely read by non-Unitarians as well as by Unitarians.

A still more important work is Mr. Jackson's "Martineau," though it is not so easy reading. Martineau's life was much quieter than that of Parker; it had in it less of action; it was lived more among students and thinkers, and less in the world. It was never at any time deeply stirred by any great social and political reform, as was Parker's by the great anti-slavery movement. It is impossible, therefore, to make the story of the life so dramatic as that of Parker easily becomes. And yet Mr. Jackson gives us a biography of Dr. Martineau that does not contain a dull line. The book is one of 450 pages. Of these 140 are devoted to the life and the personal characteristics of the man, and the rest to his writings and his thought. If the first part of the book is interesting, the second part is masterly. Mr. Jackson is one of our most scholarly men, one of our best writers, and one of our clearest thinkers. He is a warm admirer of Dr. Martineau, and has devoted years to a study of his writings. As a result we have a presentation of the leading features of Dr. Martineau's philosophical and religious thought that is singularly complete, exact, and luminous. A more extended biography of our great teacher is desirable; and we shall all look forward with keen interest to that which is promised us by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton. But it will be long before any one gives us the contents of Dr. Martineau's great books so intelligently, so freshly, and in every way so satisfactorily epitomised, discussed and weighed, as Mr. Jackson has done.*

THE LIGHT OF TRUTH.

AT the recent annual meeting of the congregation of the Carlisle Unitarian Church, Mr. James Arloch, J.P., was one of the speakers, and we are glad to be able to reproduce here the concluding passages of his speech:—

On this day we stand upon the verge of a new century; the dead past lies behind, the nebulous future before us; and thoughts rise thick and frequent on the heart of an old man who looks back upon the many outcomes of that religious unrest, that divine discontent, which for the last fifty years has roused men from the stagnation of their soul's apathy for a time, and fed the lamp of Truth from sources manifold and many an unexpected cruse. Notably, the Evangelical and Anglican revivals, appealing to earnest and reverent souls from different centres; hailed each as the day-spring from on high, yet fading and dying, failing in the world's regeneration from the same cause, Limitation; the one, regardless of historical research, confining truth to one book, assumed to be the one infallible literal Word of God, revelation for all time, final, unalterable; the other, striving to fetter the vigorous struggling present with the manacles of mediæval thought—the two diverse, nay opposite, in method, failing alike in their grand intent, both striving to bind in chains the viewless spirit, that free spirit of the son which brooks no bondage save the links which bind him to the All-Father's loving heart.

So has it fared in the recent past, that we, belonging to the Church of a Larger Hope, professing no damnatory creed or narrow dogmata have had a vast responsibility towards the quickening of true religion in the world. And by true religion I mean no system based upon a single book of revelation, no hierarchy, no absolute system rounded, finished, and in its finality all-sufficing.

True religion is rather that spirit of endeavour after holiness, that inward craving for more light, that spiritual communion along the radiant path which, from the faint and fluttering embers in the soul of each, leads the aspiring spirit athwart the darkness of Doubt along the rainbow bridge of Hope, even to the full orbed majesty of the Light Eternal from which the first faint spark was kindled in the heart of humanity—our Immanent God.

The world stays not still but ever moves onward with a ceaseless progress towards perfection, according to inevitable law, that law which is in effect and purpose, God. And through all the shifting phases of the thoughts and ideals of the best of men, above all the systems of man's inadequate devising there has shined with gathering lustre the radiant Star of Truth, guiding man's devious footsteps along the narrow path of progress, surely and yet more surely, nearer and yet nearer, ever onward to the Eternal Sun. And when, as spiritually free and untrammelled in our glorious quest, we may feel exultant in that heritage of light our fathers won through sore travail of soul and all the powers of darkness, at such a time as this, the trysting point of that which has been and that which is to be, the question cries aloud for truthful answer from the conscience of each, soberly, rationally, in no short spasm of emotional excitement—"What are we ourselves doing to advance the cause of true religion in the present?" how will our individual lives stand in the full blaze of God's great searchlight at the last, when the dawn shall have expanded into noontide glory, and the light of no reflected planets shall be needed, for God Himself will be the glory and the light of our fuller being?

The dying poet cried aloud, "Light! more light!" and as we stand by the deathbed of an expiring century, let us not alone cry out for light, but strive to quicken into new flame of holy trust and hope, more certainly assured, the embers as they may burn low upon our heart's shrine, quickening the spiritual life which draws us nearer to the source and centre of all life; kindling each one his lamp from every source of light, not fettering God's eternal sunshine of guidance; but from the inspiration of the past, from the hope of the future, let us each "let our light so shine before men" that haply some poor shipwrecked brother, seeing the beacon light from far, may yet take heart and even from the darkness of Death's dark shadow confess that—

God's in His heaven—

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEALS.

Bermondsey.—Mr. E. Howard, 24, Inverness-terrace, W., who is taking charge of the work at Fort-road during the coming winter, writes to appeal for help in personal service and for various gifts. After thorough cleaning and decoration the church is to be reopened on the 25th inst., and any friends willing to help are requested to communicate with Mr. Howard. Wanted are a few men's voices for the choir and the sacred concerts to be given every Sunday after evening service; also, occasional good soloists. Mr. Howard further writes:—"The London District Unitarian Society has acted liberally in making a grant for doing up the church and carrying on the winter's activities and all excess of expenditure over this I am going to contribute myself. But outside these expenses a certain outlay on what might be called capital account ought to be made so as to give our up-hill work a fair chance of success: and as some people prefer to give in kind rather than money, here is a list of some of the things we ought to have:—(a) A new Sunday-school library, the present one being worn out and read out; (b) a portable gymnastic apparatus for the boy's club; (c) half-a-dozen sets each of chess, draughts, and dominoes, and a dozen strong wooden boards; (d) a gallery clock, to correct the prevailing slow watches of the neighbourhood, and keep time in Sunday-school and boys' club. I should also like to have illustrated papers and magazines, especially those pretty well up-to-date, to be distributed after being read at the club among the poorer residents round about the church. In addition, perhaps, any of your readers who have a good stock of plants may be able to spare me two or three large palms for platform decoration, and cut flowers sent in any Saturday, on and after the 24th inst., will be much appreciated. I want to make our House of God and House of Man attractive both spiritually and æsthetically. About £20 would pay for all I require. Gifts in kind should be sent to Mrs. Cooper, 43, Upper George-road, Bermondsey, with advice to me, and contributions of money to myself."

Croydon Domestic Mission.—Mrs. Grover, of 17, Oakfield-road, Croydon, writes in reference to the Domestic Mission at Dennett Hall, the annual meeting of which was reported last week, calling attention to the good work that has been done, and appealing for funds. There is a Sunday-school Band of Hope, coal and slate clubs, a savings' bank, and classes of various kinds. The hall has been recently enlarged, and only lack of funds prevents an extension of the work. Donations may be sent to Mrs. Grover, or to Miss Ellis, 1, Addiscombe-grove, or to the secretary, Mr. P. N. Rands 11, Bencham Manor-road, Croydon.

Ballymena, co. Antrim (Appointment).—The Rev. Joseph Pollard has received and accepted a unanimous invitation from the Ballymena Committee of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster to take up ministerial duties in the handsome church in this thriving manufacturing town, and will commence duties there with the New Year.

Belfast: York-street.—Last Sunday evening the first of a series of lantern services was held, conducted by the Rev. A. Ashworth, his subject being "Scenes from the Life of Jesus," illustrated by thirty-five beautiful slides. The hymns sung were thrown upon the screen, and the service was much appreciated. It was held from eight till nine, after the ordinary evening service, and similar lantern services are to be held on the first Sunday evening of each month during the winter.

Boston.—The service on Sunday evening was taken by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.R.G.S., who preached a most interesting sermon on "Fruit Bearing," in which he spoke of the necessity of thanksgiving for the bountiful harvest recently gathered in; and also urged all present to endeavour earnestly to sow the seeds of good character, truthfulness, and love, for the "Great Harvest of a Future Life."

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—On the occasion of the complete renovation of the school buildings attached to Lewin's Mead Meeting, a most successful and enjoyable congregational soirée was held on the evening of the 2nd inst. The proceedings commenced with a reception, by the Rev. A. N. and Mrs. Blatchford, of between two and three hundred friends, amongst whom a number of friends from Oakfield-road Church, with the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Warschauer, the Rev. Alfred Lancaster (minister-in-charge of the Domestic Mission) and Mrs. Lancaster, were most cordially welcomed. By the considerate action of the Trustees, the girls' schoolroom has been completely modernised and made thoroughly effective for the work of the Sunday-school, the restoration and the decoration of the rooms meeting with unreserved appreciation. During the evening brief addresses were given by the ministers present. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., gave hearty expression to the thanks due to the trustees and to the satisfaction felt that they had been able to regard the restoration of the fabric, devoted to the religious instruction of girls associated with Lewin's Mead Meeting, as lying within their powers. He tendered the warmest acknowledgments of the congregation, and of the teachers to their faithful friend, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, who, on behalf of his co-trustees, had supervised the work with most successful and conscientious care. The thanks of all were owing also to Mr. John Curnock for his generous gift in the interest of the school, and to their kind friend, Mrs. Osborne, who, in affectionate remembrance of her late husband, Mr. Thomas Francis Osborne, had given all the school furniture and appliances for the girls' Sunday-school. The Rev. Dr. Warschauer expressed the kind wishes of himself and the members of his congregation, aptly pointing out the growing importance of such social gatherings to the religious life and work of a congregation. The Rev. Alfred Lancaster gave expression to his pleasure at finding, in such an assembly, abundant evidence of earnestness among our friends in the South of England as well as in the North. Throughout, the proceedings offered a most pleasing and most hopeful omen of future congregational work and usefulness.

Chesterfield.—The Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., concluded his ministry at Elder-yard Chapel on Sunday, Oct. 28, prior to his settlement at Monton, in succession to the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A. On Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, the members of the congregation made a presentation to Mr. Bennett of a revolving book-case, a reading-lamp, and a selection of books; and on the same evening the members of the Chesterfield Students' Association, of which Mr. Bennett has been secretary since its formation two years ago, presented him with ten volumes of Ruskin's works, beautifully bound, at the same time passing a resolution of warm appreciation of his services.

Eastbourne.—The recent debate showed that Unitarians in Eastbourne are few. The town is fond of concerts, theatricals, and Church parade. The newspapers are all devoted to the Church interest, or at least are sufficiently prudent not to offend it. Under these circumstances it was satisfactory that the Eastbourne Gazette should bear the following testimony to the Unitarian minister:—"Although Mr. St. Clair's religious views are not likely to find favour in Eastbourne, it is only fair to say that in the debate he comported himself in a manner worthy of a scholar and a gentleman." The Gazette also publishes a letter from Mr. St. Clair remarking on some of his opponent's tactics, and concluding as follows:—"To take the vote of the meeting was outside the conditions, and unfair to me. It was known that very few Unitarians were present, because there are but few in the town. It was not to be expected that my arguments would change the opinions of the orthodox straight away. I was satisfied that a number of men and women gave me their thoughtful attention. The vote the first night seemed to me to be carried by girls; the second night I did not stay to witness the farce. Fancy, the truth on so profound a subject as the Trinity of Persons and the Deity of Christ being decided by a vote! It is ridiculous. Yet it was only in that way that the Trinitarian doctrine was first accepted and made compulsory in the fourth century."

Edinburgh.—Preaching at St. Mark's last Sunday, the Rev. R. B. Drummond referred to the union of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church, happily effected in the previous week. It was, he said, an event of great historical importance, second only to that of the Disruption of 1843, though it had nothing of the heroic quality of the latter. While reserving the right of criticism, they might surely offer their best wishes for the success of the Union, and express the hope that it might tend to the deepening of spiritual life, the promotion of charitable feelings, greater liberality of thought, and the advancement of the Christianity of Christ, the religion of love to God and man. At the same time, remarking on the danger to civil and religious liberty which might result from a Church becoming too strong, Mr. Drummond said that in that act of Union they must greatly deplore the absence of any suggestion of reform or change in the Church's Creed. The old Calvinistic Confession drawn up at Westminster two and a half centuries ago, embodying in all their original severity the hideous doctrines of the Puritan creed, was still retained as the standard of belief. Yet it was notorious that that Confession, and the two catechisms, which were the manuals of religious instruction, represented the faith of only the most unenlightened section of the Church, while the Church as a whole, represented by her professors and doctors of divinity and intelligent laity, had completely outgrown them. There was no greater scandal in the present day than the retention of those obsolete standards as the professed and ostensible faith of a Church which no longer believed them.

Gateshead.—The Rev. A. Harvie preached on Sunday evening on Professor Max Müller's contribution to religion through his studies of languages and ancient religions. "As men come," he said, "to found their own religious opinions upon conviction rather than upon tradition, they will turn with ever-renewed joy to the writings of him who first showed how universal and how unanimous in the deepest things has been the voice of religion."

Kingswood, near Birmingham. — The usual Hospital Services took place last Sunday. The collections, in aid of the amalgamated charities of Birmingham, amounted to nearly £6. Special sermons and music marked the occasion.

Liverpool: Hamilton-road.—At the first social evening of the season, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. White, who were recently married at the Mission, were the guests of the evening, and received from the assembled teachers and elder scholars, numbering over one hundred, not only an enthusiastic welcome, but, as a mark of their affection and esteem, the gift of a handsome American organ. The Rev. J. L. Haigh, who occupied the chair, appealed to the young people for an even greater degree of earnestness and devotion in the good work to which they had set their hands. Mr. White, in acknowledging the gift, said the Mission had been the best influence for good in his life. True religion meant true happiness.

London: Mansford-street.—The annual meeting of past and present scholars of Spicer-street and Mansford-street was held on Wednesday last, Nov. 7. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, there was a very large gathering, "Old Scholars" being very well represented. The Rev. W. G. Cadman, on behalf of present workers, gave a welcome to friends from a distance, and referred to the satisfactory condition of the Sunday-school, which not only kept up its numbers, but year by year showed an increase of elder scholars. During the evening Miss Upton, of Oxford, made a presentation of two handsomely framed engravings "Diana or Christ," and "The Doctor," to Mr. J. G. Foster, for thirteen years secretary of the Sunday-school. The pictures were subscribed for by Mr. Foster's friends and fellow-workers at Mansford-street, in recognition of his long and faithful services. Letters were read from Mr. Stanton, Preston, Mr. E. B. Squire, and the Rev. C. L. Corkran, expressing their appreciation of Mr. Foster's faithful work. The meeting closed with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

London: Stamford-street.—The second meeting of the Social Institute took place on Oct. 29, when the Rev. F. K. Freeston delivered a most interesting lantern lecture (the first occasion of using the new lantern purchased by the chapel committee) entitled "Old Father Thames." On the previous Friday the Rev. Morgan Whiteman gave a lantern lecture to the members of the Band of Hope, called "The Black Spot on the Mersey," illustrated by views which the lecturer had taken himself. The Children's Happy Evenings commence on Oct. 10, and at the meetings already held the attendance has averaged about 100. Last Sunday being the Sunday-school anniversary, special services were held, Miss Marian Pritchard conducting that in the morning, when her subject, "Mutual Encouragement," was treated in a charming way. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie was the evening preacher, and gave one of the series of discourses on "A Great City's Needs," his subject being "Education." There were good attendances, and the scholars sang special hymns at each service. On Monday, by the invitation of Mrs. Crocker and Mrs. A. H. Matthews, between thirty and forty of the members of the Mothers' Meeting were entertained at tea, after which an adjournment was made to the lecture hall, and a presentation of a marble clock and a silver thimble was made by the members and other friends to Mrs. Crocker in recognition of her silver wedding day and of the fact that she had been connected for nineteen years with the society of which she is now the president. Mrs. Crocker thanked the friends for their kind and handsome gift, and spoke of the pleasure she took in the work of the Mothers' Meeting.

London: Stepney Green, E.—At the religious conference at College Chapel, in connection with the Central Postal Mission, held on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 3, Dr. Herbert Smith gave an address on "Ritualism." It was listened to with very close attention, and followed by several speeches. Miss L. Tagart, president of the Postal Mission, occupied the chair.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The series of special services arranged in conjunction with the District Association with a view to deepen the religious life of the churches in and around Manchester began in the Unitarian Free Church on Sunday, when the Rev. H. Gow, B.A., of Leicester, preached morning and evening. His morning subject was "The Power of Good and the Power of Evil." In the evening the subject was "The Lord's Prayer: the Creed of Christendom." The special services are to include an address by the Rev. J. C. Street at the Pendleton Town Hall on Sunday afternoon next, Nov. 11, and services at the church on Sunday evening, the Rev. J. C. Street; Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.; Saturday and Sunday, Nov. 17 and 18, the Rev. W. Binns.

Midland Christian Union.—The autumn Conference was held at Kidderminster on Monday, Oct. 29. The Rev. L. P. Jacks, who has been president of the Union for the last four years, took the chair at the opening of the proceedings, and expressed the great regret with which he felt obliged, on account of other claims of work, to retire. He had stated at the spring meeting that such would be the case. He spoke of the great interest he had taken in the work of the Union, and acknowledged his debt of gratitude to the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, the secretary. He wished great and continued prosperity to the Union, and vacated the chair. The Rev. Joseph Wood then took the chair, and said that the appointment of Mr. Jacks as Tate lecturer at Manchester College had rendered that step necessary. Mr. Jacks had rendered great service to the Union, and they were glad to know that they should still have his help in that work. He moved a resolution accepting the resignation with regret, and acknowledging the zeal and ability with which Mr. Jacks had served the Union for the past four years. This was seconded by Mr. H. E. Perry, and supported by Mr. Charlesworth, and cordially passed. The Chairman announced that the question of Mr. Jacks's successor as president was still under consideration. The Rev. Vernon Herford, of Oxford, then read a paper on "The Corporate Life of our Churches: Stability or Drift," in which he deplored the want of settled convictions and the exaggerated individualism which afflicted them. Their great organic defect was the want of a doctrinal standard. Religion without dogma was as irrational as a body without a skeleton. A community to have faith must have an authorised belief. And the first step after which they should strive was to bring it about that all their churches should unite in a common declaration of allegiance to Christ. A discussion followed, in which the Revs. P. Dean, E. D. Priestley Evans, A. A. Charlesworth, and others joined. Mr. Jacks said he knew it was heresy to say so, but his objection was not against a creed per se, but because it was difficult to formulate any creed which would bind together the churches. The great weakness of the ministry arose from their refusal to submit to any kind of discipline. Nothing could be worse for a man than not to be subject to any kind of discipline. It was not the strongest men who found discipline irksome, but men of a lesser and inferior degree of strength. If they were to experience any great revival of religion in their midst, he believed it would ultimately take the form of creating a discipline to which all would have to submit. Nothing had discouraged him more than the reluctance of the ministry to accept the scheme submitted by the late Dr. Martineau at Leeds. It was refused not so much because of defects in the scheme as the fact that it involved discipline, against which the ministerial nature seemed to revolt. He was in sympathy with the essayist in so far as he insisted upon some sort of discipline. Mr. Wood said he would have no objection to a creed if it could be so prepared as to embrace all Christians. Mr. Herford, in closing the discussion, repeated that they ought to work towards a definite doctrinal standard. There were difficulties in the way, but he hoped that the leading men would spend time and thought in trying to find out a workable scheme. Mr. Jacks had put his finger on one of their chief characteristic weaknesses, the want of discipline. At the close of the Conference the ministers and delegates were entertained to tea in the schoolroom, and in the evening service was held in the New Meeting, conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood on the greatness of humanity and the power of great men to lift human life up towards the ideal. It was the influence of soul upon soul that was the saving of power in human life. It was not an institution which was to be the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, nor a creed, nor a set of beautiful principles, but a noble example, that was the true dynamic and the power of God unto salvation. What was the secret of Arnold's unique hold upon English young manhood at Rugby? It lay in character: a great fascinating magnetic personality. The test of all true greatness was the power to lift men up and promote their happiness. The great man saved his race by arresting the drift; men into whose soul God had breathed a new thought, or a loftier ideal, or an intense passion for right, truth, and justice. When Italy was ground down by despotism, and the hearts of lovers of liberty failed them, then Mazzini rose and stopped the drift. Forty years ago, when a materialistic philosophy had well-nigh swept from their midst a belief in God, James Martineau arose, and mainly by his labours and influence arrested the drift, and won that splendid victory for spiritual against materialistic philosophy which had done so much to reinvigorate the Church and inspire the world with a new hope. Human sin was the greatest drift of all. Christ had arrested the drift of selfishness, cruelty, greed, and lust, and had showed the world that men could be pure, loving, Godlike. Let them all strive to imitate Christ, and as it was said of the late Clark Maxwell, make faith in goodness easy to other men.

Mossley.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, in the Christian Church, by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., of Bury. In the afternoon a cantata, "Under the Palms," was given by an augmented choir. There were good congregations, and the collections amounted to £31 7s. 11½d.

Newbury.—During the summer scientific and social rambles have been held, with addresses by the Rev. E. Turland, Mr. T. H. Stillman, and Mr. C. Wright. A Band of Hope and Mercy has been formed, and a new Library opened in connection with the Sunday-school. There is to be a monthly week-night lecture. Mr. Turland has given the first, the theme of which ("The Languages of the World, with written and spoken specimens of forty of them") proved attractive.

Portsmouth.—The first annual meeting of the Young People's Religious Union was held in the "John Pounds' Training Home and Institute for Girls," 79, St. Thomas's-street, on Wednesday, Oct. 31, Mr. Cosens Prior, the President, in the chair. The Union was formed in October, 1899, on the suggestion of the Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, who delivered an address on the subject at Grindelwald during the stay of the "Pink Party." Its objects are:—"To band together the Young People of the Church who may be in search for truth; for the discussion of religious doubts and difficulties; and to foster religious life, and to spread rational views of religion." A satisfactory report of the year's work was read by the Secretary, Miss Boecker. The attendance at the meetings was on an average very gratifying, but during the summer months showed a slight decrease. Papers on various religious and secular subjects were read by the members during the year. The Union is entirely managed by the Young People of the High-street Chapel, who look forward hopefully for another successful year.

Rotherham.—The first lecture of the new session of the Literary and Social Union of the Church of Our Father on Tuesday, Oct. 30, was given by Mr. James Wilson, of Sheffield, until recently proprietor and editor of the Indian Daily News, his subject being, "The Language of the Future." The chair was taken by the Mayor of Rotherham (Councillor G. Gummer), who expressed his pleasure in being asked to preside, and said that he had always had a great esteem for the Unitarian Church. He went on to deplore the shocking prevalence of bad language in the streets of the town, a complaint strongly endorsed on the following Saturday by the Rotherham Advertiser. Mr. Wilson, in the course of his extremely interesting lecture, said that the question whether there would ever be a universal language was a curious speculation, and then described the great prevalence of English throughout the world, and dwelt on various changes in the use and meaning of words. English, he thought, might at least become the language of international communication.

Selby (Appointment).—The Rev. John Dale, of Bury St. Edmunds, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit here and will enter on his duties on the first Sunday of the New Year.

Shepton Mallet.—The first meeting of the winter session of the Unitarian circle was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday week, under the presidency of the Rev. L. T. Badcock. A good musical programme was rendered, including the cantata "Autumn's Queen," by J. Booth. In an interval refreshments were served by the ladies of the circle, and a very pleasant evening was spent, closed by a comprehensive vote of thanks.

Shrewsbury.—The 209th anniversary of the High-street Church was celebrated on Sunday, the occasion being observed also as a Harvest Thanksgiving. The preacher was the Rev. C. H. Well-beloved, who, in the evening, took for his subject "The Ethics of Unitarianism," laying stress upon their sense of the importance of character and individual responsibility as an essential part of a wholesome religious life, worthy of the Gospel of Christ. The collections were on behalf of the choir fund.

Southern Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of this Association took place at Ringwood on Friday, Nov. 2. The Committee met in the afternoon, and there was a tea in the schoolroom. In the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel, which was brightened by the new incandescent gas burners, used for the first time in honour of the occasion. Mr. J. Cogan Conway, President of the Association, occupied the chair, and opened the meeting by welcoming the visitors, and giving a brief statement of what he held to be the faith of Jesus Christ, expressed in modern terms. That faith, he said, was ours. Mr. G. Cosens Prior made a sympathetic reference to the death of Professor Max Müller, and dwelt on the influence on our religious life which the realisation of the true meaning, often unsuspected, of words in common use might exercise, words such as truth, sceptic, intelligent, sympathy, miscreant, candidate. Truth, especially, was something that would hold, and sceptic a seeker after truth. The Rev. C. C. Coe gave an interesting narrative of the raising of the Twentieth Century Fund, in sums varying from a shilling to a hundred pounds. It now amounted to a thousand guineas, and he hoped that his experience might prove an incentive to younger men to take up similar work in future. At the committee meeting in the afternoon, several valuable suggestions for the employment of the fund had been made, which he hoped would bear fruit. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who met with a hearty reception, expressed his sense, and that of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of the importance of maintaining centres of Unitarian influence in country places, which often supplied valuable elements of strength to larger communities. He did not know what would become of London, for instance, without the continual influx of fresh life from the country. We had a gospel to preach that would prove a source of comfort and strength to all sorts and conditions of men, and he referred to instances that had recently come under his own notice, of the power of our gospel over Suffolk labourers, cultivated Roman Catholics, and Anglican University graduates, distinguished in the service of the Queen. Some people seemed to think the Unitarian minister's sole object was to ventilate dry dogmatic statements. He knew no such ministers, nor did he believe they existed; they were mere figments of the imagination. He went up and down the country a good deal, and saw as much of our churches as most people, and it seemed to him the Unitarian minister's aim was to preach the love of God and the hope of man, unhampered by the dogmatic superstitions of the ages. The Rev. E. S. Anthony pleaded for a definite organisation as a branch of the Church of Jesus Christ, in preference to a continuance of our present chaotic state of isolated individualism. Mr. M. B. Baker, of Ilminster, as one living in the neighbouring Western Union, expressed friendly sympathy with the South. Mr. F. Pinnock, the new secretary, suitably responded to an expression of goodwill to the Southern Association on the part of the meeting, and regretted the absence, through indisposition of his predecessor, Mr. Blessley. The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott proposed, and the Rev. E. C. Bennett seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman. With the singing of the hymn, "One Holy Church of God appears," and the pronouncing of the Benediction by the Rev. C. C. Coe, the proceedings terminated.

Stalybridge.—The parents' party was held on Saturday evening, and was largely attended, over 200 being present. The Rev. W. Harrison distributed the certificates to the successful students at the examination, conducted by the Manchester District Sunday-school Association. He said their school still took the lead in these examinations. Fifty scholars sat, and forty-eight passed, which showed that there had been good teaching. In addition to the ordinary certificates, a large number of special parchment certificates were awarded to scholars who had either passed in the three groups of subjects, or had been successful for three years. Some of the scholars had filled a first parchment and nearly filled a second, one young woman having passed in twenty-seven subjects. When she came up to the platform to receive her parchment she was greeted with loud applause. Mr. Harrison said he did not know what the school would do for teachers if it were not for those who sat for the examinations. The active workers in the church also came from the Sunday-school. If it were not for the Sunday-school, the church would soon cease to exist. But large as the number was who joined the church they lost the greater part of their young people. He calculated that if they had retained one half of those who passed through their school, even allowing for deaths and removals, the average at their church would be about 2,000. It would be some consolation if those they lost joined other churches, but this was not the case. He attributed it to the fact that the parents did not attend, and when the scholars settled down in life, then they followed the example of their parents and became indifferent. He made a strong appeal to the parents, not only to send their children to the school, but also to set them the example of attending public worship.

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

Referring recently to the Act of 1876, by which Vivisection was first licensed in this country, Miss F. P. Cobbe says:—"Should that ill-omened Act either remain unchanged on the Statute-book or be modified only by insignificant amendments and unreliable guarantees against abuses which are practically inseparable from Vivisection, the twentieth century will infallibly see a turn in the tide, and instead of growing tenderness, pity and sympathy for the lower animals (and for all weak and defenceless beings), it will witness a return to the barbarism of Le Droit du Plus Fort. . . . For the lesson of the Founder of Christianity 'BE MERCIFUL,' as your Father in heaven is merciful,' men will have substituted the old pagan cry, 'VAE VICTIS.' And what, we ask, will it then profit our nation, or all the nations of the earth, if a hundred serums and anti-toxins, and a score of new surgical operations, be discovered for the cure of the diseases of the body and the lengthening out of the span of human life to a century, if, meanwhile, mankind have lost, smothered, stifled, killed in their own hearts mercy and pity, generosity and sympathy."

The above Society appeals to the Public for aid.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

We hear with great regret of the illness of Mr. Stopford Brooke, which prevented his giving his third lecture on "Poetry" at University College on Thursday, and will also prevent his fulfilling an engagement to preach to-morrow (Sunday) morning at Platt Chapel, Manchester. Mr. Brooke, who preached on Sunday week at Manchester College, Oxford, and lectured on Thursday week at University College on "Browning's Women," is now ordered by his doctor complete rest; but it is hoped that it will not be long before he is able to take up work again.

Mr. Carpenter's lecture at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, in the course on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," dealt with the Fourth Gospel. Having pointed to the striking differences in the order of the history, in the events recorded, and in both the manner and matter of the teaching between the Fourth Gospel and the other three, the lecture referred to the question of date, and noted that more recent criticism, aided by the production of further evidence, had modified the conclusions of the Tübingen school. It was generally admitted that the date could not be later than 110 A.D. Dr. Sanday, holding to the Apostolic authorship of the Gospel, was inclined to put it about 90 A.D. Dr. Harnack held that it might have been as early as 80 A.D., but inclined to a date much nearer 110 A.D. He, unlike Dr. Sanday, was convinced that the Apostolic character of the Gospel could no longer be sustained. But even orthodox critics now admitted that the Gospel was a "translation" of the teaching of Jesus into a new dialect belonging to the realm of Greek thought, and that it was, as Dr. McGiffert said, composed "with a free hand." Mr. Carpenter then dwelt on the leading religious conceptions in the Gospel and the first Epistle of John, which he said must always be read together. They represented the religious experiences of disciples in the first age of the Church, rather than the personal followers of Jesus. The value of the Gospel was, therefore, not in the details of its history, nor even in the actual words of the teaching, but in the world of thought and feeling to which it gave the reader access. It represented the life of Christ, as a spiritual presence, in the believer's heart. The concluding lecture in the course is to be given next Tuesday, the subject being "The Bible and the Church." It is very satisfactory that a capital attendance has been continued throughout the course.

The battle is now set for the election of the London School Board on Thursday, the 29th inst. The time for the withdrawal of nominations is past, and the issue is clear. None of our readers will have any doubt as to how they ought to vote. The one thing to insist upon, and to use every opportunity of urging upon voters, is that no one shall abstain. For the first time in twelve years the Progressive party in 1897 obtained a majority, and it is of the utmost importance that this dominance of those who are determined to set the interest of the children and of sound education before everything else, should be maintained. Charges of extravagance and of unworthy hostility to "Voluntary" schools are made by the Moderate party against their opponents, but have been abundantly disproved—that of extravagance by a distinguished Moderate, Sir Charles Elliott himself.

On the question of hostility to "Voluntary" Schools, charged against the Progressives, as shown in the provision of what are alleged to be unnecessary school places in the Board-schools, a very effective reply has been issued by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Chairman of the School-Accommodation Committee (1897–1900), who though retiring from the Board after twelve years of strenuous service, has slackened no energy in the present conflict. In a leaflet issued by the Progressive School Board Election Council (Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C.), Mr. Bowie replies as follows to this charge :—

1. During the existence of the present Board, ninety-four applications have been made to the Board of Education for their authority or sanction to provide additional school places in different parts of London. The total number of places thus applied for was for 38,442 children.

2. Following the usual practice, the Managers of Voluntary Schools in the immediate neighbourhood of the proposed new school or enlargement were communicated with in each instance, and only on eleven occasions did these managers accept the invitation to appear before the Committee to state their objections; and these objections had reference to only 2,868 places out of the total 38,442.

3. The Minutes of the School Board prove that the Moderate Party only challenged a division on 7,399 out of the 38,442 places for which application was made; so that the whole Board, without any party division, consented to the supply of upwards of 31,000 additional school places.

4. The Board of Education at Whitehall, which cannot be accused of supporting the Progressive Party, withheld or postponed their sanction in respect to 2,198 places only, out of the 7,399 upon which the Moderate Party challenged a division. These places represent seven enlargements of existing schools.

These facts and figures completely dispose of the charges of providing unnecessary accommodation, and of the hostility to Voluntary Schools. Denominational Schools, whose managers devote their attention to improving education, have had no occasion to complain of the action of the Progressive majority on the School Board. In supplying school places, the Progressive Party have concerned themselves, not with rival Churches or Creeds, but with the education and the welfare of the children of London, whose parents belong to all denominations and to none. For these reasons, they can honestly plead with the people of London to again return a Progressive majority.

Dr. Clifford has issued a strong appeal to all friends of sound education to maintain the Progressive leadership of the past three years in the new Board, and to prevent a renewal of the theological wrangling and sectarian strife which so seriously crippled the work of the Board in the six years before 1897, under the régime of Messrs. Diggle and Riley. The Progressive victory was a gain not only for the general work of education, but not less for sound Biblical instruction. Speaking of its results in this respect, Dr. Clifford says :—

"The teachers have been unmolested. They have not been 'circularised' concerning the Trinity in language that suggested Tritheism, as under the Riley régime. They have been trusted to keep the 'Compromise' of 1871, both in its letter and spirit. Passages of Scripture chosen from that great Citizens' Book, the Bible, by the Board, and chosen according to the age and capacities of the children, have been committed to memory, explained and illustrated in a way the children could apprehend and apply to the needs of daily life. The 'definite religious teaching' of the Ten Commandments, of the Beatitudes, the Sermon on the Mount, the 23rd Psalm, and of the Poem on the Praise of Love in Corinthians i. 13 has been imparted not to make sectarians, but to inspire high ideals, quicken the sense of duty, and train in practical religion. Even Sir John Gorst is forced to declare that he has 'no hesitation in saying that the Bible teaching in the Board-schools is so much superior to that in the Voluntary schools that no comparison is possible.'

"Now, this Biblical instruction was not introduced into the schools of the people without grave misgivings on the part of many advanced educationalists; but thirty years' experience has completely vindicated the wisdom, the fairness, the justice and usefulness of the London plan, which is not, be it remembered, that of reading the whole of the Bible, but of using portions of it selected by the Board, first because of their fitness to touch chords of moral and spiritual power in the child not reached by other parts of the instruction in a popular school; and, secondly, because of their elevation beyond the ordinary sweep of sectarian controversies; and then illustrating and applying these selected Scriptures without any infringement, either in spirit or letter, of the total exclusion of any and every formulary of the Churches. That plan has been followed in many, if not most, of the School Boards of the country. It is very probable it will be introduced immediately into the State schools of Victoria, and it is gaining favour in some parts of the United States. It has certainly justified its claim to stay."

THE upholders of sectarian teaching are unresting in their endeavour to secure a reversal of this sound policy, and this is the strongest reason for securing a renewed victory for the Progressive party. Dr. Clifford quotes a number of the Moderates' utterances, which clearly show the danger which has to be met:—

Mr. Sharp, the leader of the "Moderates" on the School Board, says, "Our hearts are very full of the religious question, but we have the good sense to keep it quiet—at least for the present." Sir Charles Elliott tells his constituents that he is anxious to see the Board-school children separated into ecclesiastical groups and taught the creeds of their parents at the ratepayers' expense. Mr. Diggle has told us that the determination of the Ritualists to reopen the religious question has prevented the Conservative organisations from fighting for the Moderates at this election. Lord Hugh Cecil affirms that "they will one day throw down the miserable settlement of 1870, and put a better in its place." Prebendary Gibson said at the last Church Congress, "We must not rest till we have secured the repeal of the Cowper Temple Clause. We will insist on our right to give the teaching of the Church in Board-schools."

And, finally, the Church Times declares:—"We must do our best to get denominational teaching in all Board-schools. Slackness in this direction will mean national apostasy from the law of God."

IN a series of articles on "Great Crusades in our Cities," contributed to the Puritan, Mr. Arthur Mee has been describing some striking examples of well-organised religious and social work. In successive articles he has dealt with "Manchester and the Methodist Mission," "Liverpool and the Social Reform Movement," and "What Glasgow owes to Mr. Moody." The October article deals with Birmingham, where Mr. Mee finds that there is no great crusade in the sense of one organisation spreading over the whole city, but "a wonderful aggregation of little organisations, which do more lasting good, perhaps, than one huge concern." Many of the most important of these, he adds, are brought under the wing of the Hurst-street Domestic Mission, with the work of which our readers are well acquainted, and of which a report will be found in another column. Mr. Mee proceeds to describe what has been done under the auspices of the Mission for the promotion of open-air concerts, by the Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children and by the Military Veterans' Association, and the article concludes:—

It is impossible to speak, however, of more than a few of the agencies coming within the scope of this Mission, which represents a greater part of the philanthropy of Birmingham than any other single organisation. At the head of it all is Mr. W. J. Clarke, who drives the working machine of the Domestic Mission. Mr. Clarke is a philanthropic corporation in himself; half the social activities of Birmingham seem to meet wherever he is. The work of the Mission embraces religious services of all kinds, in many places; teachers' preparation classes; classes for physiography, experimental chemistry, sewing, dressmaking, music and singing, basket-making; recreation rooms; magazine circulation; flower distribution among the poor; a general advice bureau; poor children's summer outings and winter "Cinderellas"; sick, savings', and benevolent clubs; Bands of Hope; cricket and football clubs; and a host of other agencies making for the physical, moral, and religious well-being of the people. Though now sixty years of age, the Domestic Mission is still in full vigour of youth, and it is only one of many institutions at work in Birmingham for the uplifting of the people, the amelioration of the lot of the poor, and the evangelisation of the city.

It is pleasant to meet with this article in the Puritan, which is one of the organs of the Evangelical Free Churches, and to find that although the National Council of those Churches refuses the co-operation of Unitarians, they yet recognise that our people are capable of doing some genuine religious work.

WE are glad to welcome the first number of a Great Meeting and Free Christian Church Messenger, an eight-page magazine, well fortified by seven other pages of advertisements and a title-page, issued by the Revs. H. Gow and W. Whitaker, of Leicester, as an organ of their congregations. In an opening address to their readers, Mr. Gow says:—

We want in this little magazine to make known the thoughts and ideals usually called Unitarian to a wider circle than we can reach from our pulpits. We do not mind what we are called, whether Unitarian, or Free Christian, or Socinian. The important thing is what we are. We shall try in this magazine to make known month by month some of the thoughts in our minds, and some of the ideals in our hearts. We believe that there are many who think as we do about religion without knowing it. There are very many men and women at the present day who find orthodoxy incredible. Such people often live alone without any religious fellowship. They believe in God and duty, but they do not realise that there is any church which stands for these things without believing in the orthodox creeds. It is especially for such thoughtful earnest men and women that we write. We believe that we could help them, and that with them we could do more to help the world.

Various helpful notes follow, on "Men and Things," "Teachers of the Nineteenth Century," "Lessons from the Society of Friends," "Free Religion in a Free Church," &c., and the last page is devoted to the Calendar of the two congregations. We trust that the Messenger will be abundantly successful in the work to which it is devoted.

MR. THOMAS ARNOLD, the second and last surviving son of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, died on Monday at Dublin, in his seventy-seventh year. Born at Laleham, like his elder brother Matthew, he distinguished himself at Oxford, but then emigrated to New Zealand, and was for some eight years a school inspector in Tasmania. There he married, and his eldest daughter, now Mrs. Humphry Ward, was born. While in Tasmania, Arnold, who had been for years in a state of mental unrest, joined the Church of Rome, and on returning to England in 1858, on Newman's invitation, became Professor of English literature in the Catholic University at Dublin. Later he joined Newman at Birmingham, as first classical master of the Oratory School, but then withdrew for a time from active membership in the Church, and in 1865 settled as a teacher at Oxford. Returned to full communion in the Church, he became in 1882 a fellow of the Royal University of Ireland, and latterly resided altogether in Dublin, where he died. In addition to his "History of English Literature" and other works, Mr. Arnold was joint author with the Rev. W. E. Addis, now of Manchester College, Oxford, of a "Catholic Dictionary."

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that on Thursday next Dr. G. Dawes Hicks is to begin a course of ten elementary lectures at Unity Church, Islington, on "The Beginnings of Philosophy." The lectures, we understand, will discuss the nature of philosophical research, and show how it necessarily associated itself with the Greek spirit. They will trace the origin of such modes of thought as materialism, pantheism, and idealism, and attempt to connect the Greek treatment of these notions with that of modern culture. Questions of moral and religious philosophy will come up for special consideration. Dr. Hicks's lectures on Kant last winter were very highly appreciated, and the present course may well prove of even greater interest and value.

THE Autumn Meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, held at Essex Hall on Thursday, we must report next week.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

VI.

THE CONGREGATIONALISTS (I.)

IT is not uncommon to see pictures which are professedly composite photographs. These tame compositions are supposed to yield the mean proportion reduced from a multitude of unequal features and varied expressions. If it were possible to apply this method to the theological views of the individuals who unitedly form such a body as the Congregationalists or the Baptists, we might secure an accurate representative of each of these denominations.

It would then be very interesting to compare them, but still more interesting to compare our composite theological photograph of the Baptist of a century ago with the Baptist of to-day, and the Congregationalist of 1800 with the Congregationalist of the present year.

This is impossible. There is no such composite theological photograph of the Congregationalist or the Baptist of the past, and the attempt of that kind which was made lately is too ambitious in its scope for our purpose. I refer to the Evangelical Free Church Catechism which appeared at the end of 1898. This, indeed, may be likened to a composite photograph; but Baptist, Congregationalist, Methodist and Presbyterian are all included. So that in this extraordinary document such prominent features as Adult Believers' Baptism, the sacred independence of each Church, the divine right of Presbyteries, the Calvinism of Knox, the Arminianism of Wesley, together with more modern views, are by the cleverest manipulation made to tone off into a tame monotony of feature which is the very triumph of compromise.

Something more to the purpose, and also a kind of composite photograph in its way, is the declaration of principles which may be found in the "Congregational Year Book." The full title of this is "Declaration of the Faith, Church Order and Discipline of the Congregational or Independent Dissenters, adopted at the annual meeting of the Congregational Union, May, 1833."

This declaration may be regarded as a fair representation of the theological position of Congregationalism at the beginning of the century, but it is so elastic as to allow of a considerable movement without any express repudiation of its terms. It is, however, valuable as furnishing something like a starting point. How its terms have been modified, and reinterpreted, if not discarded, through the pressure of increasing knowledge and progressive thought, will be shown presently.

Its author—for, with the exception of some slight alterations, it was the production of one mind *—was George Redford (1785-1860), an eminent Congregationalist minister who presided over the Union in 1834. Dr. Redford, the friend of John Angel James, and the biographer of William Jay, was well fitted to compose such a document. He rested in the moderate Calvinism of his day; his Biblical scholarship was untroubled by modern critical problems. A man at once able, moderate, and safe, he could state with authority and acceptance the "leading doctrines of faith and order maintained by Congregational churches in general" described as "such a statement as any intelligent member of the body might offer, as containing its leading principles." That such a statement adopted in 1833 should maintain its place in "The Congregational Year Book" of the present year may be regarded as a somewhat remarkable circumstance, and might easily mislead an incautious inquirer. The delighted conservative might point to it as a proof that Congregationalism stands precisely where it did, and that to talk of any Theological "Movement" were absurd. Unfortunately for such a contention, the modesty of the Declaration renders it abortive. It does not profess to be a "bond of union"; for, "disallowing the utility of creeds and articles of religion as a bond of union, and protesting against subscription to any human formularies as a term of communion, Congregationalists are yet willing to declare, for general information, what is commonly believed among them, reserving to every one the most perfect liberty of conscience."

This reservation of liberty allows the progressive Congregationalist to treat the "Declaration" very lightly. It is looked upon rather as a register of the theological tide of the thirties than a limit to the tide of to-day. But though modestly promulgated, and moderate, even elastic, in its phraseology, the level of thought which it records has not been disturbed without a considerable amount of persecution being meted out to the rash innovators who declined to regard its accommodating phrases as the last word of theology.

Perhaps the article or principle which most directly contradicts the trend of modern thought is XIX.

> They believe that Christ will finally come to judge the whole human race according to their works; that the bodies of the dead will be raised again; and that, as the Supreme Judge, He will divide the righteous from the wicked, will receive the righteous into "life everlasting," but send away the wicked into "everlasting punishment."

In 1845 a young minister at Hereford, Edward White (1819-1898), who had spent a year of his theological training under Dr. Conder, brought out his book "Life in Christ." It advocated a theory of annihilation for all except those who accepted Jesus Christ, and thus contradicted a part of the statement in principle XIX.

"His views on immortality," we are told, "exposed him at first to severely hostile criticism, and greatly injured his worldly interests."* The book went through many editions, and caused much stir in the theological world, but few of those who to-day reject the doctrine of everlasting punishment would take refuge in Edward White's alternative.

The author of "Life in Christ" was soon to take an honourable part in defending a more notorious heretic than himself. He had removed from Hereford to Hawley-road Chapel, Kentish Town, London, when the furious "Rivulet Controversy" arose, and Congregationalism was shaken to its centre by a modest collection of a hundred poems, composed by a young minister named Thomas Toke Lynch. In reviewing this controversy the first feeling is one of utter amazement at the disproportion between cause and effect. One is apt to suppose that "The Rivulet" must have been the title of some advanced journal in which the newest theology was suddenly exposed, or a polemical pamphlet in which the mild evangelical orthodoxy of the Union's declaration was openly defied. It is with something like a shock of surprise that one sees the modest little volume in its old-fashioned binding containing a few religious poems—"and this," one exclaims, "set a great denomination by the ears, and roused a controversy the echoes of which can still be heard after half a century." And yet those who attacked it were moved perhaps by an instinctive dread that it was the portent of a new departure.

The man who originated the conflict, and posed as the champion of orthodoxy, was Dr. John Campbell (1794-1867). He had studied at St. Andrews and at Glasgow, attending the Divinity Hall of the Congregational Church at the latter city. From a charge in Scotland he had removed to the Tabernacle, in Moorfields, but having abandoned the ministry to devote himself to religious journalism, he started a number of periodicals.

In some of them, that is to say in The British Banner, The Christian Witness, and The Christian Penny Magazine, he delivered his attack on "The Rivulet," publishing it as a pamphlet in 1856. At that time Thomas Toke Lynch (1818-71) had by his writing and preaching begun to exert a deep and peculiar influence on a few minds. Dowered with gifts of the poet and musician, he saw with an artist's eye, and both in mind and person there was something about him distinguished and peculiar, an aloofness from the ordinary type of Congregationalist minister.

"His mind," says an attached disciple, Samuel Cox, "was set in a different angle to most minds, an angle which gave him, not only a deeper insight into spiritual realities, but an insight of a peculiar kind."* His first book, "Theophilus Trinal," published in 1850, expresses this peculiarity of insight.

Some of it is avowedly autobiographical, and it is not difficult to see in it a most shy and sensitive nature, with instincts both artistic and poetical, stretched on the rack of ministerial experience.

Preaching afterwards in more "respectable" places, it was agreed that his visage and form were ghostly and ghastly; that his manner was abominably nervous, ragged, and harsh; and that his words, whatever else they might be, certainly were not "the gospel." Fire there was in him none denied—but it was strange fire.†

Upon this shy, sensitive teacher burst the thunder of Dr. Campbell, in a pamphlet called "Nonconformist Theology or Serious Considerations for Churches, Pastors, and Deacons, being Seven Letters to the Principals and Professors of the Independent and Baptist Colleges of England on the Pernicious Errors of Mr. Lynch's Rivulet," &c. The reason why Dr. Campbell condescended to notice "The Rivulet" was that its author had offered it as a hymn-book for the House of God, and had used it as such in his own congregation. The Doctor complained that the cardinal doctrines of Christianity were absent from the book, and that it was suited neither for Trinitarian nor even for Unitarian worship.

Let it not therefore as the alternative be supposed that it must be adapted to that of Unitarian worship. That does not follow, and to say so would be to display defective knowledge of the subject of Unitarianism, and to speak contrary to truth, as well as to do a serious injury to an every way respectable, intelligent, and liberal body of Christians, for such the Unitarians are to be considered.

Much of the pamphlet consists of a comparison between "The Rivulet" and a Unitarian Hymn-book, thus: "We cannot pass without suffering the Unitarian Hymn-book again to speak. In page 56 of the Supplement to that Hymn-book we have the following: 'In the Cross of Christ I Glory,' &c. Compared with this, the Rivulet, nay, a thousand Rivulets, were but a bed of sand and gravel without a single drop of the 'Water of Life!'"

From so doughty a champion of orthodoxy this commendation of Unitarianism and of a Unitarian Hymn-book is not perhaps without interest, and in a piece of self-portraiture, such as the pamphlet is, a trait of liberality should not be ignored. The utter inability of its author to understand Lynch is well brought out in this frank confession. "Much poetry have we read, we have gazed at the clouds at all seasons of the year, but never yet were we conscious of the gaze resulting in the 'softening of our hearts,' or of their imperative dismissal of 'our hurry, distress and alarm.'" So Dr. Campbell dealt with what he termed the "passages of drivelling doggerel" in "The Rivulet." But his attack awakened a protest from some who saw in it an unworthy attempt to assail and injure a fellow-minister.

Fifteen ministers, amongst the more eminent being Henry Allon, Thomas Binney, Newman Hall, S. Newth, Sam Martin, Robert A. Vaughan, and Edward White, signed a protest against the attack. The matter was complicated by the conduct of Binney, and the assertion that he had not read the protest which he had signed. This embittered and prolonged the controversy, and pamphlets from Binney, Grant, Edward White, and others appeared, and stormy meetings were held, and bitter things were said, and stinging letters written, and he who had unwittingly raised the storm went on his way, battling with ill-health, preaching to his small attached flock when able to do so, deeply influencing a few minds and creating an attitude of mind with regard to Nature and life and God which has helped to make Congregationalism something very much wider and fresher than it was before "Theophilus Trinal" wrote and preached, and the "Rivulet" began to meander down tracts of desert that were very dry.

THE deterioration of character never begins by the deliberate choice of evil, but by loving and seeking some good thing out of relation to the whole of life. In periods of great luxury and extravagance certain tendencies develop out of proportion and result in decay of character. In the pressure of active life such a mistake is always easy, for we become so absorbed in the pursuit of proximate aims that we make final ends of them, forgetting that their value lies only in serving as a means to something beyond.—The New Humanity.

LITERATURE.

SOME CONGREGATIONAL HISTORIES.*

THE books and pamphlets included in the following notice are examples of a large amount of valuable work that has been done of recent years towards preserving and making available in convenient form the history of our Free Churches.

By the side of Mr. Gordon's "Historical Account of Dukinfield Chapel," published in 1896, and Mr. Manning's "History of Upper Chapel," Sheffield, recently noticed in these columns, we are very glad to be able to place Mr. Priestley Evans's "History of the New Meeting House, Kidderminster."(1) On the title page Mr. Evans modestly claims only to have "compiled and edited," and the book is in fact not so much a finished history as a valuable collection of documents and other material out of which the history may be constructed, and a series of most interesting biographical sketches. Although the new Meeting House dates only from 1782, Mr. Evans's history rightly goes much further back, to the ministry of Richard Baxter at the parish church, beginning in 1641 and ending with the Restoration. As a Nonconformist, after 1662, Baxter did not, however, return to Kidderminster, though his influence continued to make itself felt there as throughout the country, and it was in keeping with his unwillingness to separate from the National Church, that when the Nonconformists began to meet regularly for worship in Kidderminster their time of service was fixed so as not to clash with the parish church, and their ministers set the example of attending the church services as well as their own.

The early history of Nonconformity in Kidderminster, with the building of the Old Meeting in 1693, Mr. Evans furnishes by printing the "Church Book," which is the property of his congregation. The old MS. book, dating from about 1785, was missing for some time, but was found again a few years ago. It briefly sketches the fortunes of the "Dissenting Interest" in Kidderminster until the death of Benjamin Fawcett in 1780, and then tells how a division took place and the New Meeting was established by those who disapproved of the minister appointed to succeed at the Old Meeting. Various correspondence of that date is given in full, including the invitation sent to the Rev. Robert Gentleman, of Carmarthen College, and his reply of Jan. 1, 1784, accepting the charge of the new congregation. Nicholas Pearsall, the writer of a great part of the "Church Book," was the leading member among the founders of the New Meeting congregation, and its most munificent benefactor. Mr. Evans devotes a chapter to him, and further sections to an account of "Pearsall's Grammar School and Trust" and to the various masters of the school. In several instances the biographical chapters are followed by a selection from contemporary letters, those relating to Richard Fry, who was minister from 1813 to 1836, including letters from Charles Wellbeloved, Theophilus Lindsey and Lant Carpenter. The roll of ministers from the time of Robert Gentleman to the present numbers fourteen, and of each Mr. Evans gives a careful account, until he notes his own appointment in September, 1900. The longest ministry was that of Richard Fry, who began life as an Independent minister, but became a staunch Unitarian, and in making the change suffered a good deal of persecution. In his old age he was much troubled by the new phases of thought which he saw in the men who followed him. Mr. Evans gives biographical notes not only of the ministers, but of a number of prominent laymen connected with the congregation, and his book contains also a full account of the many institutions which bear witness to a vigorous and persistent life in the church. He prints a good part of the Trust deed, showing that it is open, and other documents determining the government of the church, and gives also a number of lists of officers, preachers of annual sermons, and of annual collections, even going so far as to give the list of stallholders at a certain grand bazaar, all of which will be of interest to those who have personal associations with Kidderminster. The book is very well illustrated, showing the present and the past buildings of chapel and school, eleven of the ministers, and of course Baxter's famous pulpit, which was being turned out of the parish church, with the rest of the old woodwork, and was bought by Nicholas Pearsall, and is preserved as a sacred relic in the vestry of the New Meeting. Mr. Evans's book is worth having, if only for the picture of this fine old pulpit, and it should be on the shelves of everyone interested in the history of English Nonconformity.

Mr. Tudor Jones's sketch of the "Rise and Progress of Religious Free Thought in Swansea," (2) embodying a history of the Unitarian Church, though prepared somewhat hastily for a special occasion early in the present year, makes an interesting little book, with good illustrations of the old chapel built in 1698 and pulled down in 1846, and of the interior and exterior of the present chapel, which was opened in 1847. The sketch opens with some notes on early reform movements in Wales, and the history of early Nonconformity in Swansea, the beginnings of which are shrouded in some uncertainty. The first known stated minister of the congregation, which is now Unitarian, was Daniel Higgs, one of the ejected of 1662, and it was towards the close of his ministry that the old chapel of 1689 was built. Connected with the history of the congregation is that of Carmarthen College, which for some years in the latter part of last century was removed to Swansea. In 1814, on the resignation of the Rev. William Howell, a division took place in the congregation on the question of the appointment of a successor. The seceders founded a new Congregational Church, and those who remained invited the Rev. Richard Awbrey of Gloucester, who was the first distinctly Unitarian minister of the congregation. From this point the account of successive ministries is more complete, and many interesting particulars are given of services rendered not only to the congregation but to the community at large by Mr. Awbrey and his successors, the Revs. G. B. Brook, Matthew Gibson (who was obliged to withdraw, after a brief ministry, on account of the health of members of his family), Edward Higginson and J. E. Manning. The ministries of the Rev. W. A. Clarke and T. Robinson falling within the last ten years are more briefly noted, and in recording his own appointment early in 1899 Mr. Tudor Jones adds an interesting account of his progress from orthodoxy and some notes on the religious changes of the past fifty years. A chapter on the trust and title deeds of the congregation, happily free from dogmatic limitations, is contributed by Mr. J. Moy Evans.

Christ Church, Nottingham (3), is of quite recent date, having been founded by members of the High Pavement congregation, and opened in June, 1864. The history is not eventful, but the record is worth preserving.

The sketch of the history of Gateacre Chapel (4) was prepared for the recent Bicentenary celebration, and gathers up into an interesting narrative what is known of the early ministers of that old country chapel. Most notable of the whole line was Dr. William Shepherd, who was minister from 1791 until his death in 1847. His grave is in the chapel-yard, the inscription on which includes the following lines written by his friend Lord Brougham :—

Humane and generous, learned, good and wise,
Here, 'midst his flock, the faithful shepherd lies :
For fifty years and six he showed the way
Which leads from this dark world to endless day :
For fifty years and six with voice and pen
He labour'd boldly for his fellow-men ;
For peace and freedom toil'd with earnest zeal,
And felt for misery all that good men feel.
A wit, a poet, more—a man lies here,
Who in the cause of truth was void of fear,
Who, cast upon a persecuting age,
Rebuk'd oppression and the bigot's rage.
O reader, stay, and bless the brave man's name,
Then to thy work, and emulate his fame.

Mr. G. E. Evans's work of research in connection with the history of our churches is well known, and has been of great service. His "Vestiges of Protestant Dissent" and other volumes have been noticed in these columns. The fine quarto volume on the churches connected with the Midland Christian Union (5) is no less valuable than the others, and contains a great deal of interesting material respecting thirty places of worship in the district covered by the Union. There are plates reproducing a large number of autographs of ministers of a good many of the churches. The book was published by subscription, with a note to say that the few remaining copies would be sold in the order of application.

MRS. WARD'S "ELEANOR."*

It is never an idle tale that Mrs. Humphry Ward undertakes to tell; and in "Eleanor," with as true an insight and power as in any other of her books, we are brought face to face with the ultimate problems of the human soul, we are profoundly touched by the tragedy of life and yet are borne onward to that which resolves the tragedy into ultimate peace.

The book is dedicated to Italy :—

"To Italy the Beloved and Beautiful, Instructress of our past, Delight of our present, Comrade of our future, the Heart of an Englishwoman offers this book.

The story runs its course in that enchanted land, and the setting of the human drama is exquisitely beautiful. It opens in an old villa on a ridge of the Alban hills, with a glorious view across the Campagna to Rome itself, and on the western horizon the Mediterranean. One scene is in St. Peter's, and the second part of the story takes us to a deserted convent yet further away among the hills. But there is not merely the fascination of such surroundings, there is the wider interest of the great movements of life and religion in Italy, the troubles of the people burdened with excessive taxation after the disastrous Abyssinian campaign, and the conflict between the national uprising of modern Italy and the Papal tyranny, worked with the utmost skill into the main motive of the story.

The chief interest centres in the lives of two women, Eleanor herself and Lucy Foster, a young American girl, who brings a delightful freshness into the story from her New England village home, and a generous nobility of character which wins for her our entire admiration and affection. Eleanor, Mrs. Burgoyne, is a young widow, who, after the tragedy of her early married life, ended by the death at the same moment of a worthless husband and her only child, has been brought into intimate companionship with her cousin Manisty, a prominent English politician, who has broken with his party and is writing a book on Italy, in praise of the old régime and the Catholic Church (though himself not a believer), as a parable, by which to insist on his own view of home politics. Eleanor has proved an enthusiastic and capable helper of her cousin's work, and has begun to hope for a new happiness in yet closer union with him. At the opening of the story they have come out from Rome, and are settled at the villa on the Alban hills, to finish the book, an aunt of Manisty's being the only other member of the household. Then a new tragedy begins for Eleanor through the advent of Lucy Foster as their guest. Manisty, at first impatient and rude in his overbearing egotism, is before long attracted, and then carried out of himself in a genuine passion for Lucy, against which Eleanor, with her poor famished heart, struggles desperately. We must not attempt here to trace the subtle development of the story, which proceeds with sustained interest to the very end. To her own undoing Mrs. Burgoyne has befriended Lucy, encouraging her shy simplicity to a new grace; then Manisty's book comes to grief through the trenchant criticisms of a friend, and his chagrin is chiefly visited on his cousin, with unpardonable neglect and ingratitude. That makes it the more bitter for her, as she realises his growing attraction to Lucy, and at last she makes a passionate appeal to the younger woman not to take from her that one remaining hope of happiness. Generous and indignant at Manisty's treatment of her friend, Lucy gives herself up entirely to Eleanor, who is suffering from emaciating illness, and the two women escape together for a time into the seclusion of an old convent. There the painful discord is resolved.

Lucy has come to love Manisty, but seeing what is due to Eleanor, makes in her own heart a brave renunciation. In the solitude, which she had sought with her friend and under the spell of the Italian scenery, her thoughts turned to Manisty.

For a moment, her heart fluttered towards him like a homing bird. Then in a sharp and stern reaction she rebuked, she chastened herself. Standing there in the night, above the forests, looking over to the dim white cliffs on the side of Monte Amiata, she felt herself, in this strange and beautiful land, brought face to face with calls of the spirit, with deep voices of admonition and pity that rose from her own inmost being.

She would have remained steadfast in her indignant refusal to listen to Manisty, if it had depended only on herself; but in the end Eleanor finds the way of peace, and with tender insistence compels Lucy to open her heart to that great happiness, which before she had so passionately coveted for herself.

When they escaped to Torre Amiata, Eleanor had no longer any hope, and knew that she could not live for more than a few months; but she was fiercely determined that Manisty should be made to suffer and to feel her power; the thought of his winning Lucy while she was still alive was intolerable, and she tried desperately to believe that the girl did not really love him. But in their solitude Eleanor is brought very near to a brave and unselfish woman, the Countess Guerrini, whose only son has fallen in the war, and whose daughter follows a religious vocation, and leaves the mother all alone. In contrast to her patient and noble courage Eleanor is made to feel the unworthiness of her own rebellious passion. At the same time she is greatly helped by Father Benecke, whom they had known in Rome and also find at Torre Amiata, a Catholic priest, excommunicated on account of a book he has published, containing some mild scientific heresy. His again is a noble grief, patiently endured, which makes Eleanor ashamed of her own. And at last, torn by her restless passion and in helpless misery, she confides in Father Benecke. The scenes in which the old man shows her the way of renunciation, and then after he has brought Manisty to them, she completes her own deliverance by telling him of Lucy's love, and finally succeeds in overcoming the girl's generous resistance, reach a great height of dramatic power, and must be read and read again.

After her first confession, Father Benecke pleads with Eleanor to accept that divine gift, which is offered to her by the way of the Cross.

"Why is it"—he resumed, each word low and pleading—"that this divine figure is enshrined, if not in all our affections—at least in all our imaginations? Why is it that at the heart of this modern world, with all its love of gold, its thirst for knowledge, its desire for pleasure, there still lives and burns "—

* "Eleanor." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.

— He held out his two strong clenched hands, quivering, as though he held in them the vibrating heart of man—

— "this strange madness of sacrifice, this foolishness of the Cross? Why is it that in these polite and civilised races which lead the world, while creeds and Churches divide us, what still touches us most deeply, what still binds us together most surely, is this story of a hideous death, which the spectators said was voluntary—which the innocent Victim embraced with joy as the ransom of His brethren—from which those who saw it received in very truth the communication of a new life—a life, a Divine mystery, renewed amongst us now, day after day, in thousands of human beings? What does it mean, Madame? Ask yourself! How has our world of lust and iron produced such a thing? How, except as the clue to the world's secret, is man to explain it to himself? Ah! my daughter, think what you will of the nature and dignity of the Crucified—but turn your eyes to the Cross! Trouble yourself with no creeds—I speak this to your weakness—but sink yourself in the story of the Passion and its work upon the world! Then bring it to bear upon your own case. There is in you a root of evil mind—an angry desire—a cupido which keeps you from God. Lay it down before the Crucified, and rejoice—rejoice!—that you have something to give to your God—before He gives you Himself!"

This is the plea, and after a while Eleanor submits, and has learnt the great secret of Christianity, in "dying to live." In the scene with Manisty, after he has found them out, fraught with intense passion, when Manisty is on the verge of despair, she at last tells him that in spite of all, Lucy does love him.

There was a silence. Eleanor's being was flooded with the strangest, most ecstatic sense of deliverance. She had been her own executioner; and this was not death—but life!

Then the story draws swiftly to a close—for Eleanor in the ultimate peace; for Manisty and Lucy in their new life of perfected love. For Manisty we cannot honestly profess much either of admiration or liking, but in the end we take him on trust for Lucy's sake.

In truth her inexperience had analysed the man to whom she had pledged herself far better than he imagined. Did her love for him indeed rest partly on a secret sense of vocation?—a profound, inarticulate divining of his vast, his illimitable need for such a one as she to love him?

The story of Eleanor and Lucy seems to us a great achievement, both as a work of art, and in that which gives to art its abiding worth.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE second number of Mr. Murray's new Monthly Review fully sustains the promise of the first. There are two admirably illustrated articles, one on "The Naval Exhibition at The Hague," reproducing three fine portraits; the other on "Some Chinese Masterpieces," showing some very striking ancient bronze work and curious old pictures. The Chinese art dealt with falls into three groups: (i.) the sculpture and metal-work of pagan China, dating from some fifteen or twenty centuries before the Christian Era; (ii.) the religious painting, introduced by the Buddhist priests in the first century A.D.; and (iii.) the secular art of the great river valleys of South China, which flourished from the twelfth to the sixteenth century A.D. With reference to China, the article by Professor F. de Martens on "Europe, China, and the Peace Conference" should also be read, with its wise caution as to the right attitude of European nations towards China, and its protest against the ruthless exploiting of a great country, regardless of all rights, in the interest of the Western nations. Of the three editorial articles that on "Cecil Rhodes" refers to the great liking of Gordon for Rhodes, and draws a parallel between the two men, concluding: "Rhodes has extended the frontiers of the British Empire: Gordon those of the Kingdom of Heaven." Yet the writer believes that Rhodes on his lower plane and in spite of the faults of his career is "an instrument of the Divine will." Students of Browning's "Ring and the Book" should read the translation of an old Italian MS. on "The Murder of Pompilia," recently discovered.

The Nineteenth Century contains the third and concluding article by the late Professor Max Müller on "The Religions of China," dealing with Buddhism and Christianity. Dr. Jessop contributes a characteristic article on "The Lake-Dwellers," and referring to Dove Cottage, pleads that the ugly houses which now shut out the view Wordsworth had of Grasmere should be cleared away. Speakers and singers will be interested in Mrs. W. Creyke's article on "Voice Culture." Mr. S. Waddington finds "The Cradle of the Human Race" in the vast table-lands between Manchuria and the Ural mountains, where, possibly, driven out of the forest and compelled to give up tree climbing, the ancestral ape learned to stand upon his feet and became a man!

The article in this month's Contemporary which should command special attention is that by the Hon. Lyulph Stanley on "Higher Elementary Schools," showing how the present educational policy of the Government threatens to cripple the efforts of the School Board to meet the needs of English children who desire some practically useful education beyond the ordinary standards. Bearing on the same interests is the experiment of the Liverpool Corporation in the regulation of "Street-Trading Children," of which Mr. Thomas Burke writes. While there has been some improvement in the condition of the streets, and good has been done in preventing trading children from entering public-houses, Mr. Burke regretfully admits that the experiment has not succeeded, and that the causes of the evil, in the present social condition of the city are deeper than any such regulation can grapple with.

In the Fortnightly Sir Robert Hart's article on "The Peking Legations: a National Uprising and International Episode" is dated from Peking, Aug 22, 1900, and is a chronicle of facts from which inferences must be drawn which Europe cannot afford to ignore. Mr. Macnamara's article on "Three Years' Progressiveism at the London School Board" has a special interest in view of the coming election.

In this month's Cornhill Mr. George Smith begins what we hope will be a long series of reminiscences of his connection with Smith, Elder and Co. His first publishing venture was R. H. Horne's "New Spirit of the Age," followed by Leigh Hunt's "Imagination and Fancy."

OBITUARY.

MR. A. H. LAWRENCE.

MR. ARTHUR HENRY LAWRENCE, of 75, Lancaster-gate, London, and 3, Adelaide-crescent, Brighton, was the elder son of the late Alfred Lawrence, and grandson of Alderman William Lawrence, and through his mother, great grandson of the Rev. Robert Aspland. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as M.A., LL.M. He was called to the Bar as a member of the Middle Temple in 1890, and he was a Commissioner of Lieutenancy for London. He was born Sept. 12, 1859, and sustained an internal injury when only nine years old, with which he had to struggle all his life, and to which he eventually succumbed in the early hours of Thursday morning, Nov. 15. His remains will be laid to rest in the family vault at Kensal Green at noon on Monday next, the 19th inst.

MR. JOHN EVERY.

DEATH has again invaded the ranks of the Lewes congregation. Following the recent loss of Mr. Cobb, we have now to record the departure of another veteran in the faith, Mr. John Every, who died at his residence, the Limes, Wallands-park, on Friday, the 9th inst. It was only a week ago that his workpeople celebrated his eighty-first birthday in the spacious institute he had built and furnished for their use and recreation, and although he was not able to be present, there were few who could have thought that he would so soon be taken from them. On Thursday week the deceased partook of breakfast in his bedroom, but an attack of paralysis supervened, from which he never recovered consciousness. He passed quietly away on the following morning. By his death the church, of which he had been for so many years such a consistent member and generous supporter, has suffered an irreparable loss. The town itself will greatly miss him. By his indomitable energy and business capabilities, he built up the Phœnix Iron Works, now employing more men than almost any other private undertaking in the county of Sussex. Mr. Every was a man of very high principle. His manliness, integrity, uprightness, and straightforwardness were apparent to all who came into contact with him. He spared no effort to advance the prosperity of the town, and his influence for good was felt in many directions. He served as a member of the old Board of Town Commissioners, and when the incorporation of the Borough became an accomplished fact, he was elected as one of its members. He was a staunch believer even then in the desirability of municipal control over gas and water, &c., and was, in the broad sense of the word, a Progressive. In politics he was a staunch Liberal, and at one time took a very active part in the Elections. As a leading member of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows, he filled the various offices of the Lodge, being also one of the trustees of the Widows' and Orphans' Fund. He was a director of the Brighton and Shoreham Building Society, and held other offices of trust.

Mr. Every was a great believer in the principles of co-operation, and thrift among the working-classes, and by every means in his power, he encouraged his men and apprentices to store their savings for "a rainy day." And when they presented him with his portrait, in recognition of his practical interest in their welfare, he made an earnest appeal to them to live worthy and true lives. On his eightieth birthday in the presence of his children and grandchildren, and also of the Mayor and other friends, he was presented with a silver epergne, &c., and that was the last occasion on which he publicly addressed his men. The esteem and affection with which those in his employ regarded him, show how it is possible for master and men to recognise their common interests. He was very generous when real need appealed to him. You had only to look into his face, and there you could see intelligent benevolence clearly outlined. He had deep convictions, which he held sacred as life, while he could exercise a large-hearted charity towards those who differed from his own religious belief, which he never hesitated to avow. He lived and died a Unitarian, honoured and beloved by all who knew him.

The funeral was held on Wednesday afternoon conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, assisted by the Rev. T. Gorton. The first part of the service took place in the Westgate Unitarian Chapel, and the interment in the family grave in St. John's Churchyard.

Everywhere in the town there were the outward tokens of esteem in which Mr. Every was held. At the chapel, all classes of the community were represented—the Mayor and members of the Corporation, members from all the various churches, including the Congregational minister and the employés from the works, who were so attached to their late master. In a letter of sympathy with the family in their loss, the Congregational minister expressed most truly what all feel: "The town is poorer in moral stamina and in Christian righteousness."

MR. JAMES SMITH.

THE Free Christian Church at Leicester has lost one of its oldest members by the death of Mr. James Smith, the father of two of our ministers, the Revs. H. Bodell Smith and A. Cobden Smith, who have the sympathy of a wide circle of friends among our churches. Mr. Smith joined this church soon after its formation in 1866, and steadily adhered to liberal principles in religion, while he won the deep attachment of all our friends by his quiet earnestness and transparent goodness. He was sixty-seven years of age.

WE find ourselves living our life and doing our work in the midst of a little set of people and a various round of circumstances. Yet there are always pressing upon us the great multitudes of interests that lie outside, and we grow dissatisfied with life. . . . If it ever oppresses us and torments us that our lives are shut in, that there is so much work to do that we cannot touch, let us remember how the Divine Master lived those precious years of his life within the narrow walls of Judaism, and hardly laid his finger upon the multitudes of humanity lying outside, always present to his vision, yet shut out from the immediate work which he had come to do.—Phillips Brooks.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Pearl-Oyster.—II.

YOU remember how "Little Lord Fauntleroy," in the pretty story about the little boy, won over his grandfather, the testy Earl, by his own loving ways to him, changing the cross-temper of the old gentleman into something bright and happy, tender and loving.

Now into this pleasant world around us, and into our happy homes, things sometimes come that we do not like, things that vex and trouble us, perhaps give us pain; they come to those of us who are young, and they come, too, to those who are older, and it would be as difficult for us to move them away, however much we should like to do so, as it would be for the pearl-oyster to turn out of its smoothly-lined shell any of the little rough substances which the sea had dashed into it. Perhaps these unpleasant things come to us all sometimes, just to give us the happy chance of changing them into brighter, better things, of using the gift we have, and which God knows we are able to use, if we will try.

Now, in your every-day life at home I think you are using this gift whenever you try to do patiently and cheerfully anything which you have to do, perhaps each day, but which you find difficult, or what you do not like; for if instead of fretting over it, and wishing it were not there to be done, you cover it over with patience and cheerful work, you are in this way slowly, but very surely, changing it into something less difficult, into something brighter and happier, and most likely, in the end, into something that it will be a pleasure to you to do. This has been done many a time with many a difficult thing, and you can do it, too, if you will try.

You are using this gift whenever you leave your work or your play to comfort and help a little brother or sister, it may be, over a lesson that seems too hard, or in any other difficulty which would be very small to you perhaps, but which brings a whole world of trouble into the little face. By covering over the difficulty, whatever it may be, with good kind help you are changing the sad and troubled little face into a bright, happy one again.

You are using this gift whenever by any kind thoughtful ways you are able to help those about you in your own home, who often have too much to think of and to do; you may, perhaps, be able to change an hour which would have seemed a very long and weary one, because there was so much to be done in it, into a happy pleasant time, passing all too quickly, just because of the help you are giving.

You are using this gift, too, whenever you are able to comfort and help any dumb animal that is frightened or in distress—by your thoughtfulness and kindness changing its fright or danger into happiness or safety again. Then possibly, one day, a chance may come to you of changing what is sad or hard to bear into something brighter and happier in a home that is poorer and less fortunate than your own. An unexpected bunch of spring-flowers, or some much-longed-for small comfort or pleasure, can, for the time at least, change the bedside of the little invalid in one of the gloomy courts of our towns into something quite as bright and beautiful to the poor child as the silvery pearl in the oyster's shell.

And as often, children, as you are able to cover over with your love and kindness anything that causes trouble or sadness to those about you, as the oyster covers with rich pearl the little rough things that enter its shell, the better the world will be because you are living in it, and the happier, by a very great deal, you will make yourselves. Then when you are older, if you try to be patient and trustful, and if you ask God to help you, you may be able to change some of the greater troubles that will be sure to come to you, as the years of your lives pass on, into rich blessings for yourselves.

But you must remember that the rough little bits that floated into the pearl-oyster's pretty shell were not covered with that beautiful pearl all at once and without trouble; they had to be very thickly covered with it before they became the precious gems, and this was not done by the oyster without labour; and you will not be able to change what is sad or hard to bear into something brighter and happier either for others or for yourselves without trouble.

You will have to try very hard to do it; you will have need to ask God's help; you will have need, too, to think very often of Christ, our Great Example, at whose advent the ancient prophecy was given forth once more: "The crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain."

ALICE HINCKS.

ESSEX HALL is used for many purposes besides propagating Unitarian theology. Visitors who called the other day might have imagined they had strayed into Covent Garden. There were ten large barrels of apples in the entrance hall. The boys and girls of the Barnard Memorial Church, Boston, U.S.A., had forwarded these apples to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie for distribution among poor children in London, particularly in connection with the Domestic Missions supported by Unitarians. Mr. Barnard wrote to say that the apples were "a gift from the boys and girls of Boston, Mass., as a little piece of international courtesy. The cause of international amity is growing steadily in this country, and will, I think, draw all nations into it. This little gift from our children to yours is a very humble but encouraging step in that direction. We cannot do too much to accustom them to take an interest in those whom they have never seen, and to do something about it." The Rev. B. F. McDaniel wrote:—"We want to stretch hands across the sea in this humble way, and assure our English friends that this Boston church for children, now nearing its seventieth year, has a heart big enough to take in the poor of London, though not all. We wish we could." The apples were forwarded for distribution to the Rev. Frederic Allen for the children at Blackfriars and Stamford-street, to the Rev. W. G. Cadman for Mansford-street and Stepney, to the Rev. F. Summers for George's-row, Clerkenwell, and to Mr. Wilson for the scholars at Rhyl-street, Kentish-town. They were all delighted with the gift; and the London children have sent messages of thanks and goodwill to the children of Boston.

RELIGION IN LITERATURE AND IN LIFE.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE, in his Essex Hall Lecture of 1893, dealt with the Development of Theology as illustrated in English Poetry from 1780 to 1830 ; and now he has given us a welcome companion to that lecture in the dainty little book which contains two lectures on "Religion in Literature and Religion in Life,"* delivered in the autumn of last year in the University cities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen.

In the first lecture, on "Religion in Literature," Mr. BROOKE defines his subject. By religion, for the purpose of this lecture, he understands not the inward spiritual life which man lives with GOD in the depths of his soul, but that life as it is embodied in ideas, or in one great idea, common to many, which a writer may express and set forth as the highest aim of life, to which he himself and others should conform. Such ideas Mr. BROOKE holds to be expressed in the most penetrative, most universal way in poetry, not necessarily in clear intellectual form, but as "a persuasive spirit in the poetry of those who live by these ideas," so that they "steal with more power, creeping into the study of imagination, into the hearts and lives of men, than they do by any philosophic or argumentative treatment of them in prose." And the subject is further defined as dealing specially with the poetry of the last eighty years, thus taking up the story of the Essex Hall Lecture.

Having briefly referred to what BURNS did by his poetry at the end of last century, and WORDSWORTH with yet greater power, to establish a healthier conception of religion, in which Love must be supreme, Mr. BROOKE notes the fading away of that great impulse after 1815, and the increase of wealth and materialism, followed by the protest of BYRON and SHELLEY in bitter satire and passionate idealism. With these two, KEATS is to be remembered, who took refuge from a world of hopeless conventionality and common-place in the worship of the beautiful.

When Keats did begin to create, the critics howled, as if they had seen a monster. Scarcely anything is more amusing or more sad in literary history than the critics' reception of Keats, the creator. Beauty rose before them in his poetry, like Aphrodite, and the apes turned from her with a malicious sneer. Then Byron, sick of this world of critical reasoning on premises invented as truths by the philosophers and critics themselves, sick of his own sensualities, sick of a materialised world, fled to Greece to die for liberty. Shelley was driven to Italy ; his name and work were blackened by Edinburgh and London ; and the religion of the day screamed at the man who, alone in a loveless world, proclaimed the essentials of Christianity as the foundation of life.

The revelation of beauty in the poetry of KEATS fell dead on the world to which he spoke. And indeed he himself came to feel, before he died, that in his religion of the beautiful there was something lacking, which, had he lived, he might have given to the world as one of our supreme poets. His prophecy of beauty needed, as Mr. BROOKE says, to be mixed with mighty moral aims, with the deep interests of mankind, with vital roots in the present, "joining loveliness to its immortal fountain in the duties of man and in the love of GOD."

And that is what we have as an outcome of that fresh impulse of nobler life, marked by the political reform of 1832, and the contemporary Oxford movement and the Liberal movement in theology—in the poetry of TENNYSON and BROWNING.

For sixty years they worked for the good and progress of mankind, on different lines and in diverse manners. They preached the religious idea of freedom, of the individual soul, alone with God, of the man realising and doing his duty to his fellow-men. They preached the religion of love, the love of God and the love of man, and the eternity of love in God. They preached, with Wordsworth, the loss of self in admiration of nature as the visible form of the beauty of God. They maintained, with Keats, the religion of beauty, but they added to it the beauty of noble conduct. They looked forward, with Shelley, to the new birth of man, and bid the world strive for it. They preached, and especially Browning, endless aspiration after unreached, even unconceived perfection, and mingled with this cry of uncontent with anything that earth can give a stern demand to do our duty here on earth, within the limitations which earth imposes. "Live in, and for, the present," they cried, "but never be satisfied with it. Follow the ever-retreating gleam ; pursue ideals which can only be realised in immortal life. We are not creatures of a day, not destined to death, but to endless progress." This was the religion they sang, and it has profoundly influenced mankind.

In the latter half of the present century, while those two greatest poets of our era were still at work, came a new period of earnest questioning and radical criticism, the spirit of which, sad but steadfast to duty, finds its most beautiful expression in the poetry of CLOUGH and ARNOLD ; and after that a time of weariness from which lovers of the beautiful again took refuge in romantic poetry, MORRIS and ROSSETTI standing to that period as KEATS did to the earlier time. But MORRIS, once "the idle singer of an empty day," lived to take hold of a more earnest purpose, and to give himself to practical endeavour to bring our common life into harmony with ideal beauty.

This new movement still awaits its great poet, and he can arise only out of a new birth of spiritual religion, glowing also with social passion. What we want, says Mr. BROOKE, for the sake of a noble literature, and especially for the sake of a lasting school of poetry, is a great social conception—

> A great social conception, carrying with it strong and enduring emotions, appealing to the universal heart of man and woman—a great social conception of the duties of mankind, of the true aim, end, and foundation of human life ; of the future of mankind in a regenerated civilisation, with all the hopes and aspirations of this conception like the winds of spring in our hearts ; and, lastly, a clear idea of how man's happiness is to be established. The basis of such a conception is the Brotherhood of Man, and that is made religious when it is founded on belief in the Fatherhood of God.

We have quoted largely from Mr. BROOKE'S first lecture, confident that such quotation will furnish to our readers the strongest incentive to procure the little book for themselves. And at the same time we commend to their most earnest attention the second lecture on "Religion in Life." This works out more fully the thought of the concluding passages of the first, eloquently tracing the lines of the ideal by which religion must be brought into daily life for the whole of our people. That ideal includes justice and loving-kindness shown to all ; it includes care for the homes of even the poorest of the people, the destruction of slums, the keeping of our common life fresh and pure and beautiful. It includes integrity and truthfulness, pity and long-suffering, and making peace and gladness in the world. True love of our country is a part of it, love also of freedom and love of mankind. But the whole lecture must be read. It leads us onward in faith and kindling aspiration to fairer works and nobler acts, to "the ideal life of immortal perfection in GOD."

THE VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

RESOLUTION TO GRANT DEGREES IN THEOLOGY.

THE scientific teaching of Theology on the lines pursued over a hundred years (1786) by Manchester College (now at Oxford) received a great impetus on Thursday, the 8th inst. An effort had once before been made to include this subject in the curriculum of the Owens College, but the fears of some and the prejudices of others presented insuperable difficulties. Ten years have passed since then. The time, however, has not been quite lost, but has enabled further enlightenment, with a wider and more courageous judgment, to achieve a marked success.

At the last meeting of the Court of the Victoria University, the Principal of the Owens College (Mr. Alfred Hopkinson, M.A., B.C.L., Q.C.), submitted the following resolution :—

That it is desirable that degrees or other distinctions in theology should be instituted as soon as practicable.

In a very able and convincing speech, he argued that, surely, of all subjects of human interest that of Theology should be regarded as an integral part of a University course of instruction. He read letters from various distinguished men, sympathising with his views, and approving of the scheme he propounded. They agreed with him that it was indispensable that a learned ministry should be supplied for the good of the State. This was recognised by the leaders of the Nonconformist bodies, and equally so by many eminent clergymen of the Established Church. Sir Richard Jebb wrote in its favour, as did the Bishop of Manchester, who stated that he still regarded it as desirable as he did when he supported it ten years ago. The Revs. Dr. M'Laren, Dr. Mackennal, Professor Caleb Scott, and other distinguished Congregationalists, were in cordial sympathy. Again, the London University had recently issued a theological faculty; why should Victoria University lag behind? As to the legality of the resolution, the opinion of Sir Horace Davy had recently been obtained, and it was entirely favourable.

Following him came Professor Dale, Principal of the Liverpool College, with an earnest advocacy of the proposal. Mr. E. J. Broadfield considered it more prudent first to make arrangements for all the courses of study which may be deemed necessary for examination. Sir Ughtred Shuttleworth took a similar view. But Dr. Ward, formerly Principal of the Owens College, and now Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, effectively supported the original resolution, and in a speech, marked by great liberality of thought, earnestly contended that whilst ample provision was made for other professions, sound instruction in Theology should be available to students preparing for the office of public teachers of religion, whether of the Established Church or any of the various Nonconformist bodies. The retiring Vice-Chancellor (Professor Boddington, Principal of Leeds College), took an antagonistic position, and contended that even if the introduction of Theology into the curriculum were permissible by the Charter, of which he had grave doubts, it would be impolitic, and harmful to the interests of the University. This argument was controverted with equal grace and force by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Chester. He was favourable on a former occasion to the inclusion of theology in the granting of degrees. He had no fears on the subject. He believed it quite possible to deal with dogma and its history without interfering, in the case of either teacher or taught, with the particular doctrines they might hold. Truly encouraging it was to hear this pronouncement, coming as it did from a dignitary of the Church. It was practically to adopt the "trade mark" of Manchester College, whose "original principle" it is "of freely imparting Theological Knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines." Certainly, the friends and supporters of an Institution which has consistently maintained this fundamental position may take heart of grace, and at length hope to see it adopted in many other seats of learning than its own. Nor was it less satisfactory to hear Mr. F. S. Powell, M.P., declare, in earnest terms, for the same enlightened course, and support the more liberal policy.

On a division, the original resolution was carried by a large majority. Its adoption will be the signal for an extension by other Universities and Colleges of a practical recognition of the truth, that Theology may be taught and studied on a basis as purely scientific and as free from prejudice and sectarian bias as any other department of research and knowledge. The far-reaching effects of such a declaration, made under these influential conditions, and sanctioned by authorities so distinguished, it would be difficult to gauge.

A MAYORAL SUNDAY.

THE town of Bury in Lancashire has been strangely agitated during the last few days. Mr. Thomas Holt, J.P., Warden of Bank-street Chapel and for forty-two years superintendent of the Boys' Sunday-school, was unanimously elected Mayor on Friday week—an election which has met with the cordial approval of all the inhabitants of the town. In the Council Chamber Mr. Holt invited his comrades to attend with him divine service in the morning at Bank-street Chapel, and in the evening at Chesham school. Within two or three hours the following protest was published in the Manchester Evening News and other papers.

THE MAYOR'S CHURCH PARADE.

Protest from the Rector.

The Rector of Bury (Canon Blackburne) asks us to publish the appended copy of a letter forwarded by him to the Commandant of the 1st V.B.L.F. :—

Dear Colonel Young,

I feel it my duty as Chaplain of the 1st V.B. Lanc. Fusiliers, and also as Rector of Bury, to enter my solemn and public protest against the Regiment being expected to worship at a Unitarian chapel in honour of the new Mayor.

I have nothing to say against his being chosen as Chief Magistrate; the days of civil disabilities for religious opinions are happily gone by; and of course he will choose where he prefers to worship. Independent citizens will decide for themselves whether, in order to do honour to the Mayor, they should put aside their usual worship of Jesus Christ our Lord.

But, sir, I protest against loyalty to their Colonel and to the Regiment being used to induce men to enter a chapel they would never enter at any other time—and ought not to do so. Who could think of Matthew Henry or the old Presbyterians, or John Wesley worshipping in a Unitarian chapel? Mr. Spurgeon had to protest against the "down-grade" leading to the denial of the Godhead of Jesus Christ.

It is not a question of religious toleration, though there are limits. It is not a question of joining in social and philanthropic work with those from whom you differ. It is a vital question of Whom you have met to worship. If it is not a question of worship, but only for show, the sooner the parade is dropped the better for everyone.

If you, sir, think it necessary to call out the Regiment for Sunday parade, I think that all may be told to fall out at the chapel who do not wish to "deny the Lord that bought them" by worshipping where equal glory is not given to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost. Roman Catholics are told to fall out, why may not Churchmen and Nonconformists be allowed a conscience also?

Should you think, sir, that I ought not to write thus I shall be quite ready, though with much regret, to resign my commission as chaplain, which has been an honour, a duty, and a pleasure to me. But I am not willing that the Regiment to which I have the honour to belong should be placed in what I consider a false and intolerable position, under the laudable desire to do honour to the Mayor of the borough, or in loyal obedience to "Regimental Orders."

Believe me, sir, yours very truly,

FOSTER GREY BLACKBURNE,
Chaplain 1st V.B.L. Fusiliers and Rector of Bury.

Bury Rectory, Nov. 9, 1900.

I think it right to say I reserve to myself to publish this protest as widely as possible.

It is difficult to regard this protest as anything else than a wilful misunderstanding of the rules as regards the attendance of Volunteers at Sunday parade; no Volunteer is under the smallest compulsion to attend against his conscience or his will, and the rector as chaplain knew this, or ought to have known it. If he knew it, why did he make this public protest? Probably to warn off all good Churchmen from entering Bank-street Chapel. If that were his object the outcome was the very opposite to that which was intended. The chapel was crammed to the doors by Volunteers, Churchmen, and Nonconformists of all sects, who came with the special purpose of showing their repudiation of the tone of the rector's letter. The member of Parliament for the borough, nearly every member of the Town Council, and all the public officers were present with the band of the Volunteers, which joined with the organ in the hymns with fine effect. It was a time of intense excitement and a red-letter day in the history of the congregation. The rector's protest was the one thing needed to impart to the service the greatest heartiness and enthusiasm, and to evoke for the members of the congregation a large amount of public sympathy.

The Bury Times of Wednesday reports a number of vigorous protests by Churchmen, as well as Nonconformists, against the Rector's action. The occasion has naturally been taken also to ask some useful theological questions. Saturday's Times will, no doubt, contain further evidence of the same kind, and it is to have a fuller report of Mr. Odgers's sermon.

WE are all inlets to the great sea of life.—Emerson.

THE UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

SIR,—The Moderator of the new United Free Church, Principal Rainy, in his opening address, is reported to have said:—

It so happens that in this union we of the Free Church are preserving everything which our predecessors considered proper to be binding. But if it had been otherwise, the contention that the Church of Christ is to be bound for ever to particular utterances put forth by excellent men, fifty or sixty years ago, at the moment of a great and exciting change which was creating a new world for them, is really monstrous. It is quite true that the Church, either in adopting or modifying the statements of its principles, ought to proceed carefully, temperately, slowly. But some of us will never consent to hold office in a Church that allows itself to be deprived of the right to interpret the mind of our Head on spiritual subjects, so as to meet the wants of our own day and generation.

It may interest some of your readers to know that the Glasgow Herald, in a leading article, after quoting part of this extraordinary deliverance, remarked: "Dr. Rainy ought not to be greatly surprised if he is taken at his word. Some plain laymen will indeed hardly fail to think that this view might have been expressed a good deal sooner. . . But if it is 'really monstrous' that men of to-day should be bound by the utterances of fifty or sixty years ago, how much more monstrous does it seem that they should be bound by the opinions of three hundred years ago?"

The writer of the article then goes on to urge that "the logical outcome of Rainyism" is a revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith so as to meet the requirements of to-day. May we not rather say that "the logical outcome" is not "revision," but the repeal of all creeds and confessions as tests of church fellowship? It is not, however, my present purpose to discuss that, but, by the above quotations, merely to illustrate once more that "Scotland stands not where it did." A. ERNEST PARRY.

Kirkcaldy, Nov. 6.

MR. FRIPP AND MR. STREET.

SIR,—I regret that Mr. Street should find so deep a gulf between himself and me. I am afraid that my surplice has frightened him, and he sees in me an "eccentric" and "sacerdotal" person who has little to do but to go about "abusing Unitarianism." Perhaps if we could have a quiet talk, on one of these wet November evenings, over a study-fire, we might discover that there was still room for both of us, and for the work we want to do, in the Free Churches.

The fact is I have little taste for doctrine. I like men. Humanity always seems to me so much more interesting and so much larger than schemes of thought. I love all Unitarians until they begin to talk Unitarianism. To meet and converse with them is a pleasure, and to work with them a privilege; but to hear them on Unitarian principles is a weariness of the flesh. What was delightful immediately becomes dull and uninspired. Mr. Street shall have a free gift of all the Unitarianisms, theologies, philosophies and principles the world contains or ever has contained, if he will leave me some live men and women. I do not care whether I am a heretic or not if I may go in and out of people's homes and be free to teach and be taught the beauty and wonder of life.

The other day, feeling rather low from the effects of the castigation I have been receiving, Sir, in your columns, and feeling the need of a change of fellowship, I paid a visit to the Mansfield Workhouse. The casual ward, I must acknowledge, was not encouraging. But in the smoking-room I met a company of cheerful old fellows who did my heart good. We exchanged ideas pleasantly on drafts, bull-ring, and tap-rooms. Then upstairs, in the infirmary, I found an old poacher, whose chief occupation, I was told, next to reading his prayer-book, was to set traps for mice under his neighbour's bed. The old Robin-Hood instinct, so strong in this Forest country, flashed up in him as he said eagerly, "I've caught thirteen." In another part of the building I met some old women, one with her pipe, engaged in talking to and cheering an ancient lady who was very blind and very deaf as well as very poor. I saw also a pale child sitting out in the open air, and gathering at last some little strength after many weary months of terrible suffering. There was much besides; and I came away feeling that here was something which was larger than Unitarianism or any other ism, and had more to tell us than the "100,000 books and pamphlets" issued last year from Essex Hall. Let Mr. Street be the most eloquent and eminent propounder of Unitarian doctrine in our churches, and I will not envy him if he will let me stay a chaplain of the Mansfield Workhouse. EDGAR I. FRIPP.

P.S.—In reply to the Rev. R. B. Drummond, I would say that the difference between Unitarian and Free Christian worship is quite beyond definition. I will not attempt it. But I know that the contrast between a Free Christian service, like that of Dr. Martineau, Dr. Sadler, or Dr. John Hunter, of Glasgow, and "Unitarian worship as usually conducted" is ineffaceable. The one, dwelling on the great spiritual truths common to all Christendom, draws us closer, with love and lowliness, to men of all Churches; while the other, dwelling on what divides us from other Christians, generally makes us feel how much more enlightened we are than they.

[We are thankful to have no acquaintance with this "Unitarian worship as usually conducted," with which the other is supposed to be contrasted. This correspondence is now closed.—ED. INQ.]

YOUNG PEOPLE'S RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

SIR,—It might interest your readers to know that the National Conference Committee have now under consideration a scheme by which the Guilds, Young People's Religious Unions, and kindred societies, already existing in many of our churches, may be drawn into closer association with each other. Also that they are preparing a form of service or manual for use at the weekly, fortnightly, or monthly meetings. As we shall hope to include all Young People's Societies that have a distinctly religious basis in the proposed Union, it will serve a good purpose if secretaries or other responsible persons will furnish me with the names and objects of their various organisations of the nature described above.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—The Committee are anxious to obtain a complete set of their reports since the Mission started in 1833, but on looking through our stock I find certain numbers missing—viz., those read at the annual meetings in 1846, 1854-57, 1859, 1880, 1881. If any of your readers should happen to possess copies which they can spare would they be so kind as to let me have them? EDWARD J. RUSSELL.

14, Claremont-road, Alexandra Park, Manchester, Nov 13.

DURING the past few weeks the Rev. S Fletcher Williams has been making a tour in the North-West Provinces of India, and has been lecturing in several of the ancient cities of that district. At Agra he gave two lectures, one on "Thomas Carlyle," in the Agra Government College to an audience of about 200, with Professor W. G. T. Mulligan, M.A., in the chair; the other on "Mechanical and Spiritual Conceptions of Religion," in the Victoria College to an audience of over 300, which filled the College Hall, and which the Chairman remarked, "included nearly all the leaders of the educated native community of Agra"—college professors, doctors, pleaders and vakils, with senior students. From Agra Mr. Williams proceeded to Lucknow, where he addressed three meetings. On Sunday, Oct. 14, he delivered a discourse on "The Great Salvation" in the Brahmo Mandir to a congregation of 100 persons. On Oct. 16, he gave his Carlyle lecture in the Hall of the Women's College (the College of the American Methodist Episcopal Church) to an audience of 300, which included the the young lady students of the College with the Principal, Miss Thorburn, sister of Dr. Thorburn, the Bishop of the American Methodist Episcopal Church in India, a large number of senior students of local colleges, college professors, members of the Lucknow bar, with representatives of other learned professions. The lecture was referred to as extremely helpful to the senior students, young men and women, as Carlyle's "Heroes and Hero Worship" is one of the text-books for the next examinations in English literature at the Allahabad University. On Oct. 18, Mr. Williams gave a theological lecture on "Science and God," in the Brahmo Mandir, where about 250 persons assembled. The Indian Messenger reports that all the meetings were successful in respect to both the number and quality of the audiences. Mr. Williams has now, we believe, returned to Calcutta.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

The September Primrose.

By chance the other day I caught sight of a primrose. It did not fare with me as with the immortal Peter Bell. First, it was not—nor, secondly, was it exactly "yellow," but, whatever its colour, it was something more than that colour or the spot where it was growing; it touched emotions and revived memories of home and of spring in Northern lands where the mighty miracle is so impressive. Here spring is so brief and, as it were, only a small incident in the procession of the year that we hardly notice it. Most of the native and many of the imported trees are evergreens; hence winter has not that look of desolation nor spring that freshness it assumes in colder climes. While the days are short and the North winds bleak, the wattle puts forth its buds, tentatively, and, if their report is favourable, the mystic message passes along the whole line, and in a few days the cypress-like shade is releaved by a wealth of golden glory that is simply entrancing. Then the drooping willow puts forth its tender leaf of yellowish green, and we know that the spring is come, but before we have fully realised the fact, it is gone and summer is upon us.

This year the wattle has bloomed and the willow kept her tryst, but we have had no spring but a rather long series of wet and chill days that would do credit to Manchester. This, of course, is unusual. In truth nothing is harder to find, here as elsewhere, than "usual" weather; my experience of Australian weather has been that it is always "unusual." At any rate we have had a wet winter and a wet spring, and we hope for a moderately cool summer, which again is unusual.

We are nearing the season when the various denominations hold their annual meetings. Preliminary to this the Roman Catholics and the Anglicans have been holding general synodal assemblies in Sydney. The Anglicans have decided not to change the title of their Church from "The Church of England"—slightly anomalous out here—to "The Church of Australia." They have also agreed upon an "Itinerant Primacy" as the Archbishop phrased it. The present Archbishop is of Sydney, but the next may be at Hobart, or Brisbane, Perth or Melbourne. The Primate did not appear to like the idea of a migratory Primacy, but had to submit to the majority.

The Roman Catholics appear to have been seized with hysteria. At a service held in St. Mary's Cathedral the preacher was the Archbishop of Wellington. Here is a passage from his sermon, written but not delivered, because the Governor of the Colony happened to be of the audience. Dr. Redwood writes:—

> The leaders and founders of Protestantism—Luther, Calvin, Zwingli—were notorious for their vices. Protestantism covered Europe with blood and ruins in the sixteenth century, and has ever since been the helper and instrument of the worst foes of Christianity. It desecrated the home, it lowered the dignity of womanhood, it devastated the school and stopped the progress of science.

This is understood to be the gauge of battle for a somewhat unscrupulous campaign against Protestantism. It will probably have quite the opposite effect to that contemplated.

In Victoria and also in New South Wales the conscience of the community has been touched by the disclosure of an extensive and most insidious immorality among the young. Earl Beauchamp in Sydney, and Sir John Maddon in Melbourne, have called attention to a serious condition of things, and newspapers and preachers have discussed it from many points of view. The actual condition may have been exaggerated somewhat, but allowing for that there is still good cause for anxiety. Climate, the houses, truancy (very extensive here), want of parental control, want of religious instruction in State schools—all these are invoked to account for a deplorable state of things. Each of them is operative to some extent, but the most fruitful cause is the practical break-down of the home and home life in considerable sections of the community. Our climate favours an outdoor, and in summer renders an indoor life almost impossible; but the true cause is moral and, I think, religious.

For reasons not easily discoverable large sections of the community are quite indifferent to religious matters. A somewhat striking example was furnished the other day by the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Victoria, when he declared that there were 80,000 "lapsed" Presbyterians in the colony. In searching for the reason of this he said some plain and bold things. Among others he affirmed: "Possibly, the Churches were ceasing to speak by their theology to the religious consciousness of the people"—a very trenchant remark that deserves consideration in other than Presbyterian churches. He deplored the false supernaturalism that had vitiated theology, and "believed that there ought to be no categorical assertion of the supernatural"; and, in concluding his address, warned the young against "making the truth of their father's creed the falsehood of their own." How after that subscription to the Westminster Confession can be exacted as a condition of service in its fold is to me an insoluble conundrum.

The Royal Commission on Religious Education in State Schools, suggested a little more than a year ago, was, after some delay, duly appointed. By this Commission the "heads" of the denominations were asked to suggest "what religious instruction was to be given in State schools." The Roman Catholics stood out from the first, and later the Jewish representative also withdrew. It was never expected that the various denominations would or could agree, but in this case the impossible or the quite unexpected has happened; unanimity was reached; the Report is signed, and yesterday was duly presented to the Premier. And now the matter has to be decided by a Referendum which may possibly be taken together with the Federal Election, when United Australia will choose her first Federal Parliament which is to meet in Melbourne till the Federal capital is chosen and built.

It fell to my lot as "head" of the Unitarian denomination to take a seat on the Commission. Of my work on it I cannot speak except that I can truly say that from first to last I honestly strove to make the lessons as unexceptionable, broad, and undenominational as possible. For a time it seemed that a minority report was unavoidable, and as that would probably have wrecked the scheme, Dr. Strong and I, who formed the minority, were anxious to discover a modus vivendi, which at last was found by the majority accepting the scheme of lessons we had drawn up, and making them a part of the whole series. Some eighty hymns, a number of prayers, in scriptural language, and two short services of "Devotion" and "Duty" I was asked to draw up complete the whole. The result is a compromise, and has the merits and defects of compromises in general; but, as a whole, I think, in spite of some objectionable features, it is quite a unique series of scripture lessons.

Some of my brethren at home may deplore my defection from a principle by which they and I also have in other days and circumstances stood—namely, the secular principle as the only consistent one for a State to adopt. Well, I have seen it in operation here now for about three years, and every day the conviction has gained strength in my mind that this secular principle is wrong in practice. As a theory it is consistent, simple, and reasonable, but in practice and in determining the duty of the State to the children whom it compels to attend its schools it is lamentably deficient and has bad results. The State's duty to the children does not end with the three R's, but must do something to arouse the ethical and spiritual faculties of their nature. So at least it seems to me, and in that belief I have acted in this case.

I have written so long a letter that I dare not add to it by referring to our domestic affairs; they must wait until I can speak of them more at length.

R. H. Lambley.

Melbourne, Sept. 19.

By the same mail we received also a letter from the Rev. George Walters, of Sydney, which we must be content to summarise.

Mr. Walters speaks, as Mr. Lambley does, of the unusually rainy season, which has seriously affected the attendance of Sunday congregations. Of the plague, mentioned in his last letter, Sydney is now happily rid.

The Rev. T. R. Skemp, who has been preaching for several months at the Unitarian Church, is reported as improved in health since his coming to Sydney. Mr. W. J. Colville has several times spoken at the morning service of the Australian Church to which Mr. Walters now ministers, the last occasion being on Sept. 9, the second anniversary of the church, when he delivered an eloquent discourse on "The Function of the Preacher." On the following Tuesday evening the anniversary was further celebrated by a very successful social gathering in the large hall of the Oddfellows' Temple, where the Sunday services are also held. About 300 persons were present, the chair being taken by Mr. George Robson, president of the church, and addresses were given by Mr. Colville and Mr. Walters. A fancy fair in August realised over £60, which will enable the church to close its financial year with a small balance in hand.

Mr. Walters also refers to the Roman Catholic Congress in Sydney, and the obnoxious passage in the Archbishop's sermon, not spoken, but handed to the reporters in the rough proofs of a Catholic paper's report of the sermon. Such an utterance has naturally called forth some very vigorous replies.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SCOTLAND: ABERDEEN.

Is this the hill; is this the kirk;
Is this mine own countree?

IN common with other Scottish cities, Aberdeen, for nearly sixty years, has been a scene of lively Presbyterian rivalry. Three years after the Unitarian church was built here, the disruption occurred which made the "Frees" the keen opponents of the auld kirk. The vigorous "come outers" speedily took to themselves stone and lime and raised places of worship, some with "steeples" and others without. Of its eighty churches, each of the two great sections, called "Established" and "United Free," holds about one-third. Each section has a college at its back, and the contest for place and power, in spite of the mutual disavowal of hostility, is very keen. The race for situation between the two in growing districts has been a determined one, both bodies being resolved to be upsides. The University must always give the Established Church an advantage. What effect the newly-consummated union of the Free and the United Presbyterian churches will have upon the Free College remains to be seen, but the institution itself has not been much in evidence since the days of Professor Robertson Smith. It appears to be of the Conservative type in Theology, and has only a small number of students; but still it has to be reckoned as a factor in the ecclesiastical life of the city.

The churches of Aberdeen, like its schools, are remarkably fine buildings. Denominational ambition made them plentiful and imposing. The line of attraction in them is æsthetic. Organs have been largely in demand, and with them came more elaborate praise. In the Established Church there is a marked ritualistic tendency. In Aberdeen the tendency had an advocate and exemplar in Dr. Cooper, now of Glasgow. His successor is reactionary; but still the music of the East Church is a strong attraction.

It was in Aberdeen that the Higher Criticism first made itself strikingly felt in Scotland. Professor Robertson Smith, then in the Free Church College, questioned the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. For his daring assertions he was cast out. Later, the progressive school had a representative in the Rev. G. A. Smith, but his departure for Glasgow left the body in Aberdeen without a man of pronounced breadth. Professor Iverach is now the only Free Church theologian of any note in the Granite City. The most recent importation to a "Free Pulpit—" the Rev. Bruce Taylor—seems likely to make a stand for progressive views. In the Established Church there is no preacher of a philosophic and liberal sort.

The Congregational churches, eight in number, are of a mildly Calvinistic kind. There is no broad, bright preacher among them.

The Unitarian movement (one in eighty) has been hindered by architectural drawbacks. The church is hemmed in between high buildings and has no proper command of its back parts. It never has had the rooms necessary for its work. Its single schoolroom is behind the church, and is entered through the church. On this account everything of a social character is either prevented or carried on with difficulty. And all along the line of its history, the movement has been poverty-stricken. No rich man has ever been connected with it. In the church collections, coppers (many of them "bawbees") far outnumber silver coins. Gold is never seen. The church has always been democratic in its character. Facing the east and situated in the N.E. district, its members have been drawn mainly from the working-classes. Even with the poorer of these the congregation might have consolidated but for southern attractions. The larger opportunities, bigger wages, and fuller life of the south continuously tempted young men and women away, and so the congregation suffered steady depletion.

The movement has suffered also from the fact that no leading man has ever been connected with it. Some well-known citizens are of families that were connected with it, but when worldly prosperity came they gave up their connection. There has been a persistent leakage this way. Indeed, the wonder should be how the congregation has survived and manifested as it has done.

The church is not near so central for its members as it once was. The increase of the city has been westward and southward, and to be central it would need to be further west.

If the church had, from the first, been a pleasant building, with ground around it for development, things would have been better. But the acoustic properties of the building were defective at the beginning, and comfort was never attainable. Any magnetism there ever was proceeded from the minister. The ministry was of a very varied kind, but by a necessity of their vocation the preachers were made controversialists. Some were of the Channing and others of the Conway type, but each found it impossible to make headway against hindering circumstances. In some way or other the ministers took part in public work. They were usually champions of progressive but unpopular views. Their outspokenness and aggressiveness, while it attracted the advanced, probably kept out the timid and worldly. The aggressiveness in the case of the Rev. William Sharman was resented in a way which nearly cost him his life; and in the case of the present minister (though he was raised to the honourable position of Chairman of the School Board) the same sort of experience was lately gone through.

One disadvantage in the ministry arose from the fact that ministers had to come from far. They were mostly English, and came as total strangers. Not having lived through the peculiar religious life of the people, it was strange to them. And their isolation and sufferings as heretics made their life so dreary and hard that it is not to be wondered at that they sought to return to the more genial South.

But there is no doubt that the church buildings were the chief hindrance to success. It has become painfully plain that there is no vantage ground possible for the congregation without a new church. In every material respect we are far behind the average Presbyterian congregation. The development of the city has compelled the removal or rebuilding of churches, and all the newer churches are modern and attractive in style.

As a pioneering force, the Unitarian movement is still needed in Scotland. Though Presbyterianism presents developed features in the persons of a few advanced men, it still retains its ancient Calvinistic standards. In its later literature we find another atmosphere than that of the Confession of Faith, but each successive preacher is obliged to sign the Confession and profess Calvinism. Albeit the tone of the pulpit is changed. It used to be polemical: now it is ethical. Science has supplanted speculation. The pressure of earth-problems has put down other-world thoughts. Theological concern is not exciting. The themes of sermons are more economic than eschatological. The pioneer ideas declared at first by Unitarians have been assimilated by Trinitarians. The old controversies are impossible of renewal. The people do not want argument; they seek for music, colour and the ministry of taste. They leave the elements of creeds to philosophy—Hegelian and Ritschlian—and ask for organs and ceremonies. It is not possible to raise interest in any theological problem except on the ground of science. Textual argumentation is done. But all that is by the way, and marks a superficial phase of mental change.

The inevitable deeper concern will arise. Up till this hour, the history of the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland has been one of fissure. Denominational disputes and sectarian strifes of the pettiest and bitterest kind make up its tale. The clerical mind has been so much occupied with church politics that it has not had either the time or the atmosphere for the higher philosophy. The typical Scottish cleric is Dr. Rainy, who is above all else a church lawyer, an ecclesiastical diplomatist. The function of such a man is the adjustment of parties and the unification of ecclesiastical power. That he has managed to effect to a large extent. But the radical work remains to be done. The deeper questions of philosophy cannot be much longer postponed or shunted. The adjustment of belief with the facts of science is already due, and must soon become imperative. Another kind of ecclesiastic will be needed when the farther work is taken in hand. A new Theology, a new Christology, a new religious philosophy must needs be, and the men who should declare it have to get their prophetic charter

For this further work Unitarians are needed as road makers. But to have any following while doing their part they need to have worthy meeting places, well furnished with everything that can aid worship. Without these they can make no progress, or even mark time properly.

The spiritual development is likely to take place without observation. It will be a very slow, quiet, leavening process. We need not expect to see the heather catching fire, for there will be no blaze nor smoke. The freedom will broaden slowly from idea to idea till all is widened. In that evolution the Unitarian influence will be that of a spirit, not of a visible force. It is hopeless to think of a large Unitarian denomination in Scotland. The other bodies will absorb the spirit of progress insensibly and become wide and free enough to admit the most advanced. "It is a consummation devoutly to be wished!"

ALEX. WEBSTER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—Preaching last Sunday on the United Free Church, the Rev. Alexander Webster said: I believe in a United Free Church, and desire to see such a Church live in Scotland in reality. It is not on matters of government or ritual that I stay outside. I left the Free Church thirty-seven years ago for theological reasons, because it seemed to me that its dogmas were not in harmony with the teaching of Jesus or with the facts of science. My conviction of the untruthfulness of its theology has deepened since then. Some of its ministers, notably Professors Bruce and Dods, have spoken otherwise than by its Confession, and the question has arisen—Are they or the authors of the Confession right? As those who have a stake in the religious life of our country we ask the United Free Church—How much, if any, of the Confession do you accept? Are you open to development? Is your title "Free" to be a fiction or a verity? Will you stand for live ideas? Are your preachers to be prophets? A reunion of freemen should be signalised by some great forward spiritual movement. It is the mission of a truly Free Church to declare the fuller significance of Revelation, Inspiration, Incarnation, Atonement, and Immortality. The name of a Church which is really prophetic matters nothing: the essential thing is the prophesying. "If," as Goldwin Smith says, "the Churches of Hildebrand, Luther, and Calvin are passing away, above them rises that Church of pure religion and virtue to which in their controversies with each other they have all implicitly appealed, and which is therefore above them all."

Birmingham: Hurst Street Mission.—A series of interesting and singularly successful meetings have just been held at this Mission in celebration of its Diamond Jubilee. On Thursday, the 8th inst., a social gathering took place in the Town Hall, under the presidency of Mr. Howard Smith, J.P., the following references to which appear in the Birmingham Daily Post:—The first part of the programme consisted of a concert, in which the Mission Orchestral Band, took part under the direction of Mr. G. Royston. The Rev. J. Wood proposed the following resolution: "That this meeting expresses its great gratification at the remarkable success of the Hurst Street Mission since its establishment sixty years ago, knowing it to have had a most beneficial influence in the neighbourhood of its operations. Further, that this meeting hereby expresses its sense of indebtedness to Mr. W. J. Clarke for his devoted and untiring labours, and heartily congratulates him upon the testimony that is borne of his efforts by the flourishing condition of the various institutions connected with the Mission, and wishes him many years of health and useful labour." One of the most glorious distinctions of the reign of Queen Victoria had been the uprising in their minds of a feeling of interest in the common people, and a desire for their welfare, and he ventured to say that in all the wonderful inventions that had increased their trade, in all the marvellous advances of science and of extension of empire that had gone on during the reign of the Queen, the most splendid jewel in her crown was that feeling of which he had spoken, and which a great writer had called the enthusiasm of humanity. That enthusiasm of humanity had given them their hospitals, orphanages, asylums, and all manner of institutions for the relief of the sickness and sufferings of the poor. It had given them their schools, colleges, free libraries, public parks, and last, but not least, missions like the Hurst Street Mission, established for the enlightenment and comfort of the people of England. The Rev. L. P. Jacks, in seconding the resolution, referred to the great work done by the Mission in Birmingham, and to the splendid services of Mr. Clarke, who had established for himself an imperishable monument in the lives of the poor of Birmingham. The Chairman then presented Mr. Clarke with a handsome album containing an illuminated address and portraits of the military veterans and workers connected with the Police-aided Mission and other institutions with which he had been connected. It would, he said, be impossible to exaggerate the heartiness with which the scheme for the presentation of the testimonial had been taken up. Other presentations were a standard lamp and an easy chair, and Mr. Field (of the Mission) and Mr. Pearce spoke in eulogistic terms of Mr. Clarke's work, Mr. Pearce remarking that there were over 700 voluntary subscribers, including seventy-five military veterans. In responding, Mr. Clarke thanked all who had shown such kindness and appreciation of his work, and he was glad to know that the gifts represented the free will offerings of his friends. The sixteen years of his service with Hurst-street Mission had not been the least industrious, he hoped they had not been the least useful, and he was sure they had been by far the most happy of his life. On the following Sunday, Nov. 11, the Town Hall was again occupied by the various Mission agencies for a united religious service. The attendance was a very large one, the musical part of the service was efficiently rendered by the Mission choir under the direction of Mr. R. A. Clarke, and the Mission band, under the direction of Mr. Geo. Royston, the hearty singing of the hymns by the large congregation assembled being particularly impressive. The service was conducted, and the address delivered, by Mr. W. J. Clarke.

Boston.—The service at Spain-lane Chapel was taken last Sunday evening by Miss Gittins, of Leicester, who preached a very interesting sermon on "God's Need of Man," which was much enjoyed by the large number of members present.

Byker.—The first social meeting of the present winter took place on Wednesday week. There was a large attendance, the Mission Hall being crowded. Mr. J. Glendining, who at present has charge of the Mission, occupied the chair, and briefly adverted to the objects of the gathering. An admirable programme of vocal and instrumental music and recitations contributed to a most enjoyable evening.

Edinburgh.—On Sunday evening, at St. Mark's Chapel, Mr. J. Haddon, M.A., M.D., gave an interesting discourse on "The Father's Will, and how to Know It." Having pointed out that the differences between man and brute, between instinct and reason, are less fundamental than is commonly assumed, and having rapidly traced the evolution of religion from language, he proceeded to show that the Will of God is to be learned, not from supposed revelations, but from a reverent study of the laws of Nature. The church, he said, is losing its influence, and the best hope for the progress of mankind now lies in the school, and in teaching the young the laws of Nature. Dr. Haddon, it may be mentioned, is a physician (not now in practice), who, having been brought up in strict orthodoxy, has gradually worked his own way to Unitarian views. His discourse was listened to with much interest.

Gateshead.—The congregation of Unity Church have decided to hold a bazaar on Nov. 30 and Dec. 1, for the purpose of raising a fund of at least £100, to secure its financial position in the immediate future. The bazaar is to be opened on the Friday by Lady Trevelyan, on Saturday by Miss Clara Lucas, of Harrogate.

Hull.—On Wednesday, Oct. 31, the Workers' League commenced its ninth session with a social meeting in the schoolroom of Park-street Church, at which Mr. and Mrs. S. Harris presided. On Wednesday, Nov. 7, in connection with the Literary and Social Union, a lecture, entitled "A Realised Dream" (Part 1), illustrated by beautiful lantern slides, was given by Mr. S. Harris, describing the first part of a tour recently made by the lecturer round the world.

Ipswich (Appointment).—In response to an unanimous invitation from the congregation of the Friars-street Chapel, the Rev. Lucking Tavener has accepted the pulpit, and will commence his charge in the new year.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual devotional service was held on Thursday, 8th inst., in the Bootle Free Church Hall, when the Rev. J. Morley Mills conducted the service, the sermon being preached by the Rev. H. D. Roberts. Unfortunately there was a very small attendance, only about thirty-five of our teachers and friends being present. Those who were present at the service were so impressed by the helpfulness of Mr. Roberts's address, and felt so strongly that they would like all their fellow-teachers to have an opportunity of hearing it, that they are arranging to hold another meeting, and Mr. Roberts has very kindly consented to re-deliver his address on Friday, Nov. 30, in Hope-street Church. The address will be preceded by a brief devotional service at eight o'clock, conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. It is hoped that all our Sunday-school teachers and their friends will make an effort to attend this meeting, as they cannot fail to be helped and encouraged in their work.

London: Essex Hall Temperance Association.—Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., treasurer of the Essex Hall Temperance Association, has, after a spirited contest, been elected a member of the new Hammersmith Borough Council, having with seven other Progressive candidates wrested seats from Conservative members of the late Vestry. The contest was largely fought on temperance lines, the close connection of the Vestry with the public-house having attained the proportions of a public scandal, and whilst Mr. Edwards and four of his successful colleagues were total abstainers, three publicans are among the defeated candidates.

London: Forest Gate.—The annual autumnal meeting of the congregation was held in the Church on Wednesday evening Nov. 7. There was a good attendance. The new rules were presented and agreed to by the members. The letter received from the London District Unitarian Society was read, in which it was stated that a grant of £400 had been made towards clearing off the debt of £500 now existing. A resolution was unanimously carried conveying a vote of thanks to the Society for their generous grant, and it was decided that a great effort should be made to raise the balance of the money. Nearly £25 was promised before the meeting closed. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards was present, and spoke some words of congratulation and encouragement to further effort. The roll of membership and the attendances are steadily increasing, and there is a large attendance at the Literary and Social Union meetings. Altogether there is a very bright outlook for the future.

London: Stamford-street.—Last Sunday evening Mr. Charles Read, M.D. (Lond.), gave the second of the series of discourses on "A Great City's Needs," his subject being "Sanitation." In a very clear way he spoke on the great importance of pure air and water, and of ventilation and other things valuable in the promoting of the health and well-being of the community, which, as a medical man, he was able to illustrate with many facts. To-morrow evening, as will be seen by the Calendar, the third of these discourses will be on "Recreation," to be given by Mrs. L. Ormiston Chant. On Monday evening the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., of Hackney, gave a most interesting series of readings, under the title of "Songs of the Big Campaign," from the poems of Kipling, Dekker, Charles Kingsley, Kennedy, and Gordon, the last being an Australian poet. On the motion of the Rev. Frederic Allen, who presided, and Mr. Athelstan Tayler, a hearty vote of thanks was given to the lecturer. The weather was bad, but the audience good.

London: The East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The second monthly meeting of this Union was held at College Chapel, Stepney, on Saturday evening last, when a most interesting and useful paper, entitled "Our Scholars and Reverence," was read by Mr. A. Thompson, of Mansford-street. Discussion followed, in which Mr. Tavener, Mr. Ginever, Rev. W. G. Cadman, Mr. Waddington, Miss Upton, and others took part. Nearly forty were present, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. Refreshments were provided as usual.

Manchester: Urmston.—The congregation has prospered since the opening of the church building. Mr. Alfred Davison's conscientious efforts as assistant to Mr. Prime in this part of the work of the Manchester Association ended in June, when Mr. W. L. Schroeder, B.A., accepted a three months' holiday engagement and gave himself heartily to the work, and was much appreciated by the congregation. During this time very successful Flower Services and Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held. For the present busy season no continuous student help is available, but the activities are increasing. A Social Union has held two very successful meetings, and the programme includes lectures by the Rev. Priestley Prime and Mr. W. L. Schroeder, and papers by Mr. Bolland, Mr. Marsh, and Mr. Canning, as well as opportunities of social intercourse. A Guild for Young People, just started, has already forty members. Two good meetings have been held, and in addition to these monthly gatherings, classes for wood-carving, sewing, and singing, and a Rambling Club have begun. Attendance at the regular evening service is encouraging, and has increased considerably. The congregation is feeling that it could find plenty of work for a resident minister of its own.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—Recently a Men's Conference was held here on the subject "How to make the work of our Church more effective." Much enthusiasm was shown at this meeting. There was a revival of the Missionary spirit. A proposal was adopted to make a house-to-house visitation in the neighbourhood, and to distribute a circular containing a warm invitation to join in our services, and a statement of our principles. The Committee and a band of young men and women have undertaken the distribution of circulars to the extent of 5,000 copies, or more if required. Another proposal took practical form last Sunday. That was to have a Sunday afternoon chat on some Christian aspect of social duty. The Rev. John Ellis presided, and explained the objects of the meeting. Mr. W. Sinclair introduced the chat on "The Christian at the Ballot-Box." Mr. F. A. Smith sang "Arise and follow me." There was a large gathering of earnest and thoughtful men and women. It is intended to hold these meetings monthly. A Congregationalist has undertaken to introduce the next chat on "The Christian as a Legislator." There was abundant encouragement in the first meeting to go on in this work. The opening soirée of the Literary and Social Union was held on Monday evening, the Rev. J. and Mrs. Ellis and Mr. and Mrs. W. Sinclair receiving the guests. There was an excellent programme, consisting of vocal and instrumental music, recitals, dances, &c., and a large gathering of members and friends.

Tavistock.—At the annual congregational meeting of the Abbey Chapel, held last Sunday, a letter was read from the minister calling attention to a pamphlet, entitled "The Use of the Name 'Presbyterian' by Unitarians," issued by the authority of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England. The following resolution was subsequently passed:—"We, the members of the Abbey Chapel, assembled at our Annual Congregational Meeting, this 11th day of Nov., 1900, having been made aware that efforts are being made to discredit the use by us and kindred congregations of the name 'Presbyterian,' hereby resolve to abide firmly by its use, as our predecessors have done, during the greater part of two centuries and a half. We held the name before the Presbyterian Church of England, which was only organised in 1836, and emphatically decline, at the request of that Church, to abandon a title, which to us, has become a watchword of freedom and religious tolerance."

Whitchurch.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. W. F. Turland preached to a large congregation a special sermon on "The Church," the occasion being the beginning of his fourth year of ministry at the Church of the Saviour.

THOSE of our young people, and the younger children especially, who delight in acting at home or at school, should make a point of getting the November number of Young Days (Sunday School Association, 1d.), for there they will find a children's play called Princess May and her Wonderful Law, written in verse, which is always easiest to learn, by Miss Marian Pritchard ("Aunt Amy"). There are ten characters, and attendant fairies as well, and the play has not far from a thousand lines. There is some good advice, too, at the beginning, which every one should read, even if they find that this play is not just what they want for their own acting. But certainly there is plenty of amusement to be got out of it, as well as good sense, which children always like.

CHORLEY CHAPEL (UNITARIAN).

We earnestly APPEAL to your readers for help on behalf of the Renovation of the above Chapel, which, through decay, consequent upon old age, is unfit for worship. It is the oldest Nonconformist Chapel in the town, having been built in 1724.

Since the choice of the Rev. Andrew Doel as Minister, the congregations have increased, and deeper interest has been shown by the people in the cause. But the present state of the Chapel hinders greater progress. £700 is necessary for the renovation. Towards this amount the congregation, though poor, have raised £300, and we have received a few responses from circulars; but we are dependent upon help from outside friends.

Contributions will be gratefully received by the Rev. A. DOEL, The Manse, Chorley; Messrs. W. H. SUTCLIFFE, Hanover-street; W. M. GILLIBRAND, Market-street; W. PORTER, Cross Hall.

THE YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION are prepared to appoint a Minister and to give him temporary charge of the congregation at Dewsbury.—Apply, E. BASIL LUPTON, 14, East Parade, Leeds.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE report of Mr. Stopford Brooke this week is "much better," and although he was again obliged to postpone his Browning lecture at University College, it is hoped that next Thursday evening the course may be resumed. Mr. Brooke's illness has been a return of his old trouble, on the first threatenings of which standing is peremptorily forbidden. That was the meaning of our reference last week to the doctor's order of "complete rest," which one of our correspondents has feared might give rise to needless anxiety.

THE concluding lecture in Mr. Carpenter's course on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" was given at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening—given at great cost, in the first hours of suffering from a private grief, and the more deeply appreciated on that account. The subject of the lecture was "The Bible and the Church." Summing up the results of the whole course, it pointed out how the new light thrown upon the character of the Bible, both as to its own contents and in comparison with other sacred literatures, had compelled immense modification of traditional doctrine, while bringing out its own intrinsic worth as far beyond that of any other scriptures of the ancient world. Three main lines of influence were noted, the progress of scientific knowledge, and the discovery of the Cuneiform remains in Babylonia, revealing an ancient literature far older than a single line of the Bible, and containing earlier versions of the Creation, of the Deluge, and other legends. Such evidence was irresistible, and the change was marked by Canon Gore's admission in Lux Mundi that "the narrative prior to Abraham can no longer be received as historical." The third influence was the study of the sacred books of China, India, Egypt and Persia, which showed that while the forms were different, the same moral and spiritual truths and aspirations found utterance, which gave to the Bible its supreme worth.

MR. CARPENTER also noted that for these other sacred literatures claims of infallibility and divine origin are made similar to those made by modern advocates for the Bible, while the actual teaching was sometimes in advance of contemporary Old Testament precepts. "An eye for an eye" was the doctrine of Leviticus. "Recompense injury with kindness" was the precept of an old Chinese sage, 500 years before Christ, and so about the same time Buddha taught, "Let a man leave anger and forsake pride," "Let a man overcome anger by love, evil by good, greed by liberality, and a liar by truth," "Hatred does not cease by hatred, hatred ceases by love." By what rule, the lecturer asked, can, e.g., the barbarous injunctions of the Book of Judges be claimed as infallible and divine, while these other precepts are declared to be simply earthly and human? As to the canon of the scriptures, that of the Old Testament came to the Church through the synagogue, that of the New Testament was the result of a slow growth of opinion in the Church, finally fixed only at the third council of Carthage, in the year 397. Thus it was the Church which guaranteed the authority of the Bible, while it was to the Bible that the Church looked for proof of its own divine authority. Each rested on the other.

THE lecture then dealt with the doctrine of the Virgin-birth, declared by Lord Halifax to be the "foundation-stone of Christianity." It showed how inconsistent the doctrine was with the main body of New Testament teaching and tradition, and how on the other hand it occurred in connection with other ancient teachers and great men. It could be traced literally round the world, from China to Peru. In the New Testament it was a materialising of the Messianic conception of Jesus as the Son of God. Canon Gore was obliged to admit that the real foundation of the doctrine was not the record in the New Testament, but the authority of the Church, and it was clung to because of its position in the Creed, and because to doubt it would strike a blow at the authority of the Church. Other teachers rested on the doctrine of the living Christ in communion with his disciples, and the doctrine of his sinlessness, as proof of his deity. These in turn were dealt with, and striking parallels from Buddhism were adduced, to show the uncertain basis of so tremendous a conclusion. Christian experience, Mr. Carpenter added, must be reinterpreted in the light of wider knowledge, bringing out the supreme truth that the Spirit of God was at work in human souls, for the redemption and education of the human race, that all might be indeed sons of God.

AT the conclusion of the lecture Mr. Carpenter said that the present century had discovered the meaning of the Bible as never before, and had found the clues to its history. It had not made the Bible an easy book; it demanded strenuousness of understanding, and of moral endeavour to enter into its meaning, to reach its lofty altitudes of thought. The great sayings of the Bible enshrined for all time the highest forms of human experience. They had stood the test of centuries. The Bible was the greatest of the great religious autobiographies of the race, the noblest testimony to the divine realities, which human life had produced. After Mr. Carpenter had left the hall Mr. Ion Pritchard, on behalf of those who had attended the course, spoke of the great interest and value of the lectures, and proposed a resolution of thanks to Mr. Carpenter, which was passed, the whole audience rising in their places in token of their earnest assent.

WE reported last week the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams's visit to Agra and Lucknow. From the latter place he proceeded to Allahabad, where on Oct. 20 he delivered his "Carlyle" lecture to a large audience in the Government Central College. The chair was taken by Mr. Satischandra Banerji, M.A., LL.B., and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer on the motion of the chairman, seconded by Professor Ramanath Dey, M.A., both of whom made excellent speeches on Carlyle's gospel of duty and sincerity. On Oct. 22, Mr. Williams presided over the celebration of the Ram Mohun Roy anniversary, which had been postponed on account of the holidays. It was held in the Kayastha Pathasala Hall. A paper was read by Babu Dinanath Ganguli; and addresses were given by Babu Bipinbehan Battacharya, Professor Ramanda Chatterjee, M.A., and the Chairman. On Oct. 23, Mr. Williams delivered a second lecture at the Government Central College, the subject being, by request, "Science and God." The Rev. C. A. Rodney Janvier, M.A., of the American Presbyterian Mission, presided over an audience which crowded the hall and overflowed into the verandah.

THE Special Correspondent at Bankipore, Behar, of the Amrita Bazar Patrika, a Calcutta daily, writing from Bankipore under date of Oct. 25, reports as follows:—"A unique scene was presented here yesterday evening. The occasion was the arrival of the Rev. Fletcher Williams. The reverend gentleman arrived here by the down Punjab mail. Quite a large gathering, headed by Professor N. N. Mitra, B.A., had met at the railway station to receive him. There were present on the occasion Babu Prokash Chandra Ray, Deputy Magistrate, Pundit Siva Nath Shastri, M.A., Professor D. N. Mallick, B.A., B.Sc., Mr. B. N. Das, M.A., B.Sc., Babu Bhagawati Churn Das, Principal Behar National College, Babu Gouriprosad Muzumdar, and others. As soon as the train steamed along the platform Mr. Fletcher Williams was accorded a hearty reception. Then the party adjourned to the bungalow belonging to Prokash Babu, which was nicely decorated for the occasion. There many Brahmo ladies had assembled, and as soon as Mr. Fletcher Williams arrived they sang a beautiful song of welcome in Bengali. Pundit Siva Nath Shastri then made a short prayer. At the conclusion of the prayer Professor Mitra delivered an address of welcome to the learned Missionary. In the course of his address he explained that as it was the day known as the Bhatridwitiya, the ladies had assembled to give him a brotherly reception. Then a girl stepped forward and decorated the high forehead of Mr. Fletcher Williams with sandal wood paste in the same way as is done on this happy occasion. Another hymn was sung, after which the Rev. Fletcher Williams made a suitable reply, wherein he explained the attitude of the Unitarian Society with regard to other religions, saying that no one religion had a monopoly of the whole truth. This reply was rendered into Bengali by Pundit Siva Nath Shastri. After light refreshments the party dispersed."

THE Rev. John Cuckson writes to us on Nov. 9, from Boston, Mass., as follows:—"The Rev. John McDowell returns to England next week. He was invited a year ago to take charge of Parker Memorial, under the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches. It was thought that the popular meetings held in a music-hall, and finally in a theatre, under the care of the Rev. B. Fay Mills and others, would result in specific gains to the little group of worshippers who have for several years attended the services at Parker Memorial, and Mr. McDowell was invited to preach to the enlarged parish and carry on the practical philanthropies of the Fraternity. The scheme turned out an illusion. The popular meetings added nothing whatever to Parker Memorial, and at the end of four months Mr. McDowell so reported to the Board of Directors. The collapse was a surprise, and through no fault of his own Mr. McDowell found himself without a parish. The Directors of the Fraternity, feeling the extreme awkwardness of the situation, and sympathising deeply with the man whom they had called to take charge of a congregation which did not crystallise, approved of his resignation with sincere regret and voted him a full year's salary. Mr. McDowell has won the esteem and affection of all who have made his acquaintance, and returns to his native land with their warmest sympathy and good wishes."

THE Daily News published on Monday a contribution from "A Bishop" (Shall we say "Hereford"?) referring to the joint action of the Bishops under Dr. Temple's direction, in the matter of ritual prosecutions. His Lordship, referring to recent threatenings of prosecution, writes:—

The Bishops, you may rely on it, are acting as a united body on definite principles. Their action in certain details may not always be exactly of the same kind as local and particular circumstances have to be considered. They are more than satisfied with the manner in which their quiet, but persistent, efforts to secure obedience—not uniformity, which is impossible—have been met; and they believe that thoughtful men and women of all ranks are content with their action under circumstances of exceptional difficulty. Many are not unaware of the possible dangers of acting in unison, and of a future Primate becoming a Pope; but they consider that for the present distress, and under exceptional circumstances, the Lambeth policy is the best. The Archbishop has not lost his qualifications as a schoolmaster in his old age, and is as pachydermatous to public opinion as the Premier; but every Bishop feels also that he is under the sway not only of a man of determined will, but of one imbued with the sincerest desire to do justice, to lean to mercy, and, above all, not to act in a hurry.

* * * *

The Primate has the most remarkable perception of the law of proportion. His mind is never so preoccupied with one thing that he cannot consider others, and though, no doubt, he is at all times interested in hearing from his Suffragans and others what progress is being made in conforming to the Lambeth Opinions, he by no means neglects such matters as Secondary Education, Temperance, and the proposed Bill for the Reform of Convocation, and giving the laity greater power in Church government, about which the Bishops will have a good deal to say in Parliament.

ONE of the best letters with reference to the unfortunate action of the Rector of Bury, which we reported last week, in connection with the Volunteers and the Mayor's Sunday at Bank-street Chapel, appeared in Wednesday's Bury Times, from "Nonconformist," who is not a Unitarian. Dealing with the Rector's letter, he says:—

He and those who have supported him have assumed that all Trinitarians who accompanied the Mayor could only do so at the sacrifice of their conscience, by doing dishonour to Christ. As one of those who had the pleasure of taking part in the service at Bank-street Chapel, I most earnestly deny the imputation. I reject the central doctrine of the Unitarians as earnestly as the Rector, but I did not in any way compromise my convictions by attending that service; I gave up nothing; it was perfectly understood on both sides that the conscience and convictions of each would be reverently respected. The whole service was most helpful and devout, and few indeed of all the vast crowd who attended, had they not known the creed of the chapel, would have known that they were worshipping at a Unitarian chapel. If I have a strong personal regard and admiration for the character of our Mayor, and share the general delight of my fellow-townsman in the honour which has been conferred upon him, what becomes of my Christian charity and brotherhood (which I have learned from Jesus Christ) if I cannot join with him in the act of Christian worship, although his creed and mine differ upon one important point? The Rector, however, says that by my action I "deny my Lord." I respectfully say No, I do not. I am sure that the Mayor's attitude to his creed is one of intelligence, sincerity, and reverence, therefore I honour him. But I am not called upon to pass judgment upon him. I have no right to do so. From the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ I am taught to honour my brethren (especially when they are worthy), to respect sincerity, to have charity to all men and their creeds. Christ's chief concern was to inculcate His own spirit and not a creed. St. Paul teaches us that the greatest thing is charity—love.

IN a review of Professor Lindsay's "Luther" in Messrs. T. and T. Clark's new series of "The World's Epoch-Makers," we noted a word puzzling to English ears in the rendering of Luther's final declaration to the Diet of Worms: "My conscience is thirled to the word of God." To relieve our doubt as to the meaning of this word, the Rev. A. E. Parry has sent us some notes from Dr. Jamieson's "Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language" (1882), from which it appears that there are three Scottish verbs "to thirl"—

(i.), from the old form thirlian, perforare; whence the English thrill and drill. This is the word to which we referred as occurring in Burns.

(iii.), active verb, to enthrall, to enslave (thus thirlage and thirldome are thraldom). This is sometimes connected with thirl-ian, to bore. Cf. Exod. xxi. 6, Anglo-Saxon version: "He shall also bring him to the door," or "to the door-post," and thirlie his eare mid anum aele, "and bore his ear through with an awl." Or it means "to bind" or "subject to"; as when a person lays himself, or is laid, under a necessity of acting in any particular way, or when a thing is bound by some fixed law. I'll no thirl myself, or be thirled, to ony tradesman; i.e., I will not confine my custom to him, as if I were bound to do it. This appears to be the sense in which the word is used by Dr. Lindsay.

AMONG the various modes for celebrating the opening of the Twentieth Century, the Swedenborg Society of London has adopted one which is both original and enterprising. They offer to all teachers of religion, whether engaged in the work in the pulpit or in the Sunday-school, a monthly booklet gratis and post-free during 1901, on one of the "Foundation Truths of the Christian Religion," explained, of course, in their peculiar method, which they claim, however, to be "in agreement with reason, Scripture, and human experience." Swedenborg has widely influenced the thought of the past, as the works of such diverse writers as Emerson and Coventry Patmore clearly show; and so it should be worth while for many to make his acquaintance on the remarkably easy terms on which it is offered. Further particulars will be found advertised in another column.

VII.

THE CONGREGATIONALISTS (II.)

IN the Rivulet Controversy Dr. Campbell and his supporters were opposing something which was vague and intangible: something which they instinctively feared, but could neither describe nor understand. They found a young man exercising a profound religious influence, who apparently omitted from his teaching all the orthodox formulas. They found that his hymns were full of Nature, and quite bereft of what they esteemed Grace. The stereotyped phrases which they regarded as indispensable to an orthodox faith were only conspicuous by their absence. But the gentle mystic who delivered his thoughtful sermons to congregations "often of not more than a score of adult hearers," and who wrote hymns, a few of which almost all churches have now recognised as a sacred possession, was not a controversialist. He did not deliberately set himself to refute a single dogma, though the spirit he cultivated and expressed was fatal to more than one. Controversy requires a more distinct issue. Such an issue was at hand. While the Rivulet Controversy was still raging, it was casting its shadow before.

Davidson the Heretic.

Samuel Davidson (1806–98), born and educated in the north of Ireland, had resigned a chair of Biblical Criticism in Belfast for the Professorship of Hebrew and Biblical Criticism at the Lancashire Independent College. For some thirteen years Dr. Davidson had occupied this position, and during that period he had made great advances in the study of his subject. Repeated visits to Germany, and the intimate friendship of some of her most learned theologians, had made him well abreast of the critical learning of the time. In 1848, after the publication of the first volume of his "Introduction to the New Testament," the University of Halle had conferred on him the rare honorary degree of "Doctor of Theology."

His recognised eminence as a Biblical scholar induced Messrs. Longman to consult him on a new edition of a work which had been long regarded as a text-book, but which was even then hopelessly behind the times—Horne's "Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures." After some consultation Dr. Davidson consented to rewrite the second volume, "treating of the origin and authorship of the books of the Old Testament," and suggested the name of Dr. Tregelles "as a scholar fitted to undertake the fourth volume." This arrangement was accepted, and after two years of labour the volume was published in October, 1856. The result of its pubcation has been clearly described in a chapter contained in the recently published autobiography of Dr. Davidson.* This chapter is entitled "Detailed Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lancashire College Committee, terminating in Dr. Davidson's Resignation, by J. Allanson Picton, M.A., J.P." Those who require detailed information should consult this volume. In the confined space at my disposal it will only be possible to record the movement in its larger aspects

* Cf. THE INQUIRER for Aug. 19, 1899.

The first note of alarm appears to have been sounded by Dr. Tregelles from that bulwark of orthodoxy the Record newspaper. Dr. Tregelles, whom Dr. Davidson had nominated as his colleague, and to whom proof-sheets of the work had been regularly forwarded, hastened, after its publication, to dissociate himself from the views which it contained. At a meeting of the College Committee in November, one of the members stated that he had received letters from those who were alarmed by the new volume, and a sub-committee was appointed to examine the book, and report to a future meeting. The report was presented at a committee-meeting three months later, on Feb. 16, 1857. While it reported certain passages—"which, taken by themselves, seemed to indicate very unsatisfactory views on some important doctrines of the gospel; such as on the Trinity, human depravity, the sacrifice of Christ, justification by faith, &c., as well as upon the inspiration of Holy Scripture"—it goes on to admit that "other statements," "found in different parts of the volume, as well as the explanations given orally by Dr. Davidson, fully satisfy the sub-committee that he holds all these vital truths, and regards Holy Scripture as inspired—an unerring authority in morality and religion, and infallible in every other important matter." What more could be wished? The Principal of Lancashire College was no heretic, all he was guilty of was the sin of apparent self-contradiction on the Trinity, human depravity, &c., &c.

The matter was not to end thus, for the report unanimously recommended that Dr. Davidson should be earnestly requested to prepare an explanation, "to make concession where concession may be justly due; and thus take the most effectual means of vindicating himself from unjust and malevolent aspersions." With this request Dr. Davidson complied, and by the following May his pamphlet appeared, entitled "Facts, Statements and Explanations." This did not allay the storm, though it extorted even from the British Banner, the paper edited by Dr. Campbell, and notorious for its onslaught on Lynch, the statement that Dr. Davidson's honour as to personal questions between himself, Mr. Horne, and Dr. Tregelles, was "fully vindicated." But honour and orthodoxy are two very different things, and the British Banner's tribute to Dr. Davidson's personal honour did not prevent it from joining the British Standard, another of Dr. Campbell's militant journals, in demanding the dismissal of the professor who had dared to hint a doubt of the perfect infallibility of Scripture, and Mosaic authorship of the whole of the Pentateuch.

At the next meeting of the Committee a resolution of want of confidence, though not put to the vote, was only postponed for another meeting after a personal interview with the professor. Nine days afterwards the subject was decided at the adjourned meeting. After two amendments had been lost, the motion of want of confidence was carried by a majority of two votes. Dr. Davidson did not immediately resign: he naturally desired to know the grounds of his condemnation. But compliance with this demand was considered "unnecessary" by the majority which made the charges, and Dr. Davidson withdrew. He withdrew deeply wounded and sad at heart. The loss of position at his age, that of fifty-one, was a serious thing to contemplate; but more serious still was the blow to the cause of free inquiry and honest scholarship. It is true the triumph of the College Committee was short and embittered. It was generally condemned; but the significant fact remained that a professor of distinguished learning had been dismissed from his post simply because, having published the results of his unbiassed inquiries, those results were unwelcome to the ruling body of a college supported by so-called Free Churches.

The Leicester Conference.

The important question whether those churches were really free was yet to be fought out, and a brief description of that struggle will close this article. It will be apparent to all, that this movement for freedom in the Church is connected with the movement for a more natural religion which was condemned in the persecution of Lynch, and more nearly connected with the more definite movement for free scholarship which was condemned in the expulsion of Dr. Davidson. The lapse of some twenty years between the last event and the first distinct expression of the movement we are considering does not sever the connection, though the limit of space precludes me from tracing that connection in detail.

It is indeed a significant fact that at the Conference held on October 16, 1877, in Leicester, on "The Terms of Religious Communion," the first paper was read by a pupil of Dr. Davidson, Mr. J. A. Picton. The Conference at Leicester had been preceded in May by a less formal gathering in London, when the same great subject had been discussed. Long before these Conferences the Rev. William Forster, a Congregationalist minister, had founded a Free Christian Church at Kentish Town, and over the entrance to the building, erected in 1855 for its worship, had caused this legend to be carved —"Diversity of opinion no bar to Christian communion."

The more detailed title of the Leicester gathering was "a Public Conference of those who feel that agreement in theological opinion can no longer be held to be essential to religious communion." The principle which excluded Forster from the denomination in the fifties had thus gained its rights to a hearing in the denomination in the seventies: its right to a hearing, but to little else. Those who desire to know how the principle was uttered, and how it was heard, must consult the closely printed, and now somewhat scarce, "Report of the Conferences on the Terms of Religious Communion held in Leicester and London." This faded pamphlet in which the carefully prepared paper is jostled by the loose, unpremeditated, vehement speech, has, in its crabbed print, a pathos all its own. It shows the seeking for a larger life. The complacent articles of agreement which one speaker irreverently called "the namby-pamby creed which still appears in the Church records and year-books" had burst like old wine-skins, and what was to become of the new wine? There is an insistent note of complaint, of inquiry, of dissatisfaction. The laughter and some confusion which one speaker caused was quickly subdued by the seriousness of the problem discussed,

Mr. Picton's paper was followed by one from the Rev. T. Gasquoine, and after a discussion Mr. Picton replied.

A second Conference was held in the Cannon-street Hotel on May 7, 1878. Papers were read by the Rev. P. T. Forsyth and the Rev. W. Miall, and there were speeches less tumultuous than at Leicester, confined, indeed, to the somewhat commonplace convention of moving, seconding and supporting votes of thanks to the readers of the papers and the Chairman. Mr. Picton's clear, persuasive, impassioned speech was on the motion "That the best thanks of this meeting be given to Mr. Brindley for his kindness in taking the chair this evening." This being duly seconded, the benediction was pronounced, and the Conference terminated.

So this passionate protest for a larger Christian life in the Congregational Churches "broke, faltered, and was still." To quote the words of one who took a leading part in the movement: "The storm was too great. Some of our men became frightened, and after another year the movement died out."

Apparently nothing could have been more ineffectual than this abortive movement, and yet to one who looks beneath the surface its influence has been very great. Its direct outcome was the doctrinal resolution passed amidst great excitement, and against the advice of the Chairman at the Annual Meeting of the Congregational Union in May, 1878. Another result of the movement, or rather of the attempt to stifle it, was the secession to a freer communion of some of its leaders. This inevitably weakened the forces of liberalism in the Congregationalist body. But that body cannot evade by the publication of ancient "namby-pamby" creeds, or doctrinal resolutions, the question which, sphinx-like, still confronts it. And when it again seriously considers the pressing problem of the limits of Christian communion, it will turn to the famous Leicester Conference for light and guidance. Though progress may have been slow, there has been progress in the century which saw the persecution of Lynch, the banishment of Davidson, and the Conference of those who felt that agreement in theological opinion could no longer be held to be essential to religious communion.

LITERATURE.

SHORT NOTICES.

Half-Hours with the Parables. Second Series. Mr. Crowther Hirst's first series of "Half-Hours" is so well known and has been so warmly appreciated that this second series is sure of the most cordial welcome. The first series was issued as "A Class Book for Sunday-schools," and for that purpose it is eminently fitted; but we are glad to see the emended phrase on the title-page of the second series, "A Book for the Sunday-school and the Home," for the two books are equally good for home use. A better or more welcome companion for quiet Sunday reading, with mother or elder sister, it would be difficult to find. The plan of the two books is the same. Each parable, with an appropriate text and verse of poetry prefixed, is first printed, and followed by a "Comment," which explains the story or picture, with many illustrative hints, to make a full and interesting lesson. Next, a poem is given in keeping with the lesson of the parable, and, finally, a story of present-day life, setting the same truth in a new light. At the end, the whole lesson is summed up in a series of questions. In preparing such a book, the author would naturally be tempted to use all the best-known and most striking parables in a first volume, but Mr. Hirst was better advised. The first series dealing with thirteen parables included "The Sower," "The Unmerciful Servant," "The Lost Sheep," and "The Prodigal Son," but there still remained to be included in the second series "The Mustard Seed," "The Hidden Treasure," "The Talents," and "The Good Samaritan." There are twelve parables in all, and as many capital stories to illustrate them. It would be pleasant to know that this admirable little book had found its way not only into the schools for class use, but into every one of our homes, where there are young children to enjoy it, and be the better for its help. (Sunday-school Association, Essex Hall. 1s. net.)

Addresses to Children is another little book "for use in home and school," to be as warmly recommended, and without a blush even in these columns, though it consists of twenty-five "Children's Columns," reprinted from THE INQUIRER. If we add that among the writers are Miss Gertrude Martineau, Mrs. Farrington, Miss Frances E. Cooke, and the Revs. John Byles, and J. J. Wright, our readers will know at once how good it is. (Sunday-school Association, Essex Hall. 8d. net.)

A Handbook for Ministers of Religion, compiled by W. Copeland Bowie, consists of a series of special services for Baptism, Dedication, Communion, Marriage, Visitation of the Sick, and Burial, to which are added a number of selected readings for Funerals, both from the Scriptures and other writings, including a number of beautiful poems. There are also two useful pages of references to Old and New Testament Lessons, and finally an admirable digest of legal information as to registration and the marriage and burial laws for the guidance of ministers. The book should prove useful, especially to younger ministers, even if, after further years of experience, each one feels that he must prepare his own services. Among the selected poems we wish that Maria Lowell's beautiful and touching verses "The Alpine Sheep" could have been included, even if it had meant the loss of Bryant's poem on "The Old Man's Funeral." If we add a word of criticism, it is that the brief address in the service of Baptism is too didactic in form. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street. 2s. net.)

The Gospel According to Darwin. By Dr. Woods Hutchinson. By "Darwinism" Dr. Hutchinson means an indiscriminate acceptance of all the many speculations, theories, and facts included under the term Evolution. The evolution of the lichenspore from the crystal is a fact as certain to him as the growth of a flower from a seed. He has in perfection that happy faculty of transmuting hypotheses into facts which is possessed only by the shallow "scientist" and the shallow "theologian." The book is interesting as a specimen of the superficial crudities that are vended in the market-place as the latest birth of time. Briefly, we are told that everything is for the best in this best of all possible worlds, if we will only look on things from the collective standpoint, and wholly disregard the growth and worth of the individual soul. If there are any who, unfitted for the world through no fault of their own, cry out against the scheme of things, the author bids them content themselves with the vision of the "triumphal, upward march of humanity, unbroken for 50,000,000 years, which still continues . . . and which is at least as worthy of our gratitude, our worship, our trust, as anything supernaturalism has to offer." We suppose that those who cannot worship a "march" must be numbered among the "unfit." (The Open Court Publishing Co. 2s. 6d.)

The Living Remnant and other Quaker Tales, by K K K, contains four sketches of life among Friends of the last generation. To one attracted by strong sympathies towards the Society they appear to be pictures beautifully drawn, true in tone, though naturally subdued in colour. Touches of humour are not lacking. "Reuben Silcox's Wooing" is not exciting, nor is his "Wedding"; but both were eminently satisfactory, and pleasant for the friendly spectator to be allowed to watch. "A Quaker Apprentice" is to our mind the best of the four short stories; but surely Ruth Silcox would not have told the lad her own love-story just at that point? The author puts no stops after her three initials on the title-page. May there be no stop to her writing of such stories, and others of greater range! (Headley Bros. 3s. 6d.).

THE BOYS IN OUR GREAT CITIES.—I.

We have lately heard a great deal of what now goes by the name of "Hooliganism," the term applied to the rowdiness and even brutality that we see now and again in our city streets, emanating from the rough youths of the neighbourhood. And although many of us strongly object to the wholesale condemnation of a large class on account of the misdemeanours of a comparative few of their number, yet we cannot hide from ourselves the fact that our boys do stand in need of the best help we can give them, if they are to learn how to resist the many dangerous temptations which inevitably arise wherever large numbers of people are massed together.

What, then, can we do to help? Very little, perhaps; but surely everyone is bound to strive to do something, and to remember that we are our brother's keeper in exact proportion to the power we possess of giving him real assistance.

There are certain principles which those who have taken up the subject in a scientific spirit agree must be followed if we wish to find the solution to this problem.

1. It is not enough to inveigh against bad habits, impure thoughts and harmful employments; we must give the possibility of choice, by introducing something better to take their place.

2. It is essential that the "something better" should be something that those whom we desire to benefit (in this case, the boys) can thoroughly enter into with enthusiasm and enjoyment. There would scarcely be any question of choice otherwise.

3. That when such a "something" has been found, the teacher or leader must never forget that it is a means for larger good; that to him its chief use is that of a lever to draw the boys upward and onward in the path of goodness, truth, and holiness. This was an essential principle with Fröbel; he laid hold of the simple games of childhood and used them as his mouthpiece, through which he could whisper into the very hearts and minds of his scholars.

Let us take it for granted that we accept these rules; where can we look for a good starting point? With my faith and hope in the Sunday-school, I naturally turn to that, though possibly my conception of its proper scope goes further than that of some of my friends. Still, nearly all of us will admit, I think, that the aim of the Sunday-school is the building up of character, the developing of a strong desire after right-doing and right living. If this is so, then I cannot believe that Sunday-school work ends with the Sunday. In our classes we can only be said to deal with the theory of our subject; what should we say of a master craftsman who was content to teach his apprentice the theoretical part without watching to see how he stood the test of practice. Yet this is analogous to the work of the Sunday-school if that only means an attendance at a quiet morning or afternoon class when we all are supposed to put on our best manners with our Sunday clothes. It may be impracticable to see much of our scholars in their daily lives, but we can see something of them in their recreation time; and, after all, it is then, when the claims of enforced steadiness at work is over for the day, that their individual strength or weakness is most fully brought to the surface.

I have just spoken of a quiet class; those of us who have had experience of boys, however, know very well that it is not easy to obtain quiet and attention with a set of rough urchins, to whom sitting still is a trial, and listening to the teacher, unless he is telling a stirring story of adventure, almost a counsel of perfection. Now, some years ago in Glasgow, a young Volunteer officer had such a class of boys in his Sunday-school. He grew quite disheartened with the pranks played by those unkemped, unwashed lads; and as for a lesson, what was the good of preparing one when he could not get anyone to listen to it. He thought of the discipline of his Volunteer corps and wished that a little of its spirit of obedience could be introduced here. The idea took hold of him; he remembered that no game is more delightful to boys than anything associated with military drill and evolutions; why should he not form his boys into a company and use this method of recreation as a lever to bring discipline, cleanliness, and order into their lives. The experiment was so successful that his example was followed in many other schools, and the Boys' Brigade was formed in 1883. Fourteen years afterwards the number of boys enrolled reached 33,000, gathered together in 771 companies, under 2,800 officers; and since that time not only have the numbers of the Boys' Brigade greatly increased, but many societies on similar lines have been instituted, and are flourishing. The aim is set forth in the following words: "The object of the brigade shall be the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of obedience, reverence, discipline, self-respect, and all that tends towards a true Christian manliness."

The drill on week-nights satisfied their love of exercise; the "uniform," consisting of cap, belt, and haversack, plus brushed clothes and clean face and hands, developed a greater self-respect, the meeting for the Sunday class—which is an integral part of the whole—afforded an opportunity for meeting their "officer" in friendly intercourse, to which the boys now looked forward with pleasure; and the once dispirited teacher found himself really making way.

I know that many people object to anything of a military type, because they consider it necessarily fosters the war-spirit, and, indeed, those who promoted the Boys' Brigade were very careful to watch for any signs of this. But they have, after this testing, found that it has not led to anything of the kind. The Boys' Brigade has been founded to make war against evil, not against men; and as everyone must perforce take sides in that terrible conflict it is well that our boys should be encouraged to fight on the right side. But a most unfortunate complication has arisen. One of our London mission schools had formed a company which had been duly affiliated to the Brigade, and had done good work for a twelvemonth, when the central authorities at Glasgow wrote to say that they had not understood that it was in connection with a Unitarian mission, and, as a consequence, it could not be allowed to continue, alleging that as the doctrine of the deity of Christ was not held, the coming of "His Kingdom" must be an unmeaning term. In vain were all explanations and remonstrances; this decision was kindly but firmly adhered to, and our own gallant little company found itself shut out.

Now, here is the question for our people to decide. The movement has borne the test of experience—seventeen years have proved its usefulness; can we not form in many of our schools a company of our Boys' Own Brigade, of which one, perhaps two, already exist? Next week I hope that Mr. J. C. Ballantyne will give some details of his company in these columns. I feel that it would be a great joy if—when the sectarian divisions are broken down, as I hope and believe they will be some time during the coming century—we could then march in a strong battalion from our schools to join the main force in its holy crusade against the sin and temptation which press so heavily upon the youth of our country.

REST.

O rest, sweet rest for weary heart and hand,
O rest, sweet rest!
The long work done, the hour of trial passed,
Welcome the quiet happiness at last
Of perfect rest.

The fighter now waxed troubled in the fight,
Sore struck and pressed,
Glad hears the message that the battle's done,
That faithful service the reward has won
Of noble rest.

The pilgrim struggling in the baffling stream,
Daunted, distressed;
Thro' darkness and the journey's rack and pain,
Ere long the threshold and the light shall gain,
And rest, sweet rest.

And Love, whose tears have bidden sad good-bye
To those loved best,
In blissful readiness forsakes the shore
Whose days can joy his spirit nevermore,
Nor yield him rest.

O rest, sweet rest! poor, striving human hearts,
Soon shall dawn rest!
The wounding cares, the blinding tears of life
Shall vanish with the burden and the strife
When comes sweet rest.

Then trust we One the thought of whom is peace,
To give us rest:
Our childish follies, cruel pride, and hate
Shall be forgotten at the Blessed Gate
That leads to rest! E. B. B.

Of nothing may we be more sure than this, that if we cannot sanctify our present lot we could sanctify no other. Our heaven and our Almighty Father are there or nowhere. The obstructions of that lot are given for us to heave away by the concurrent touch of a holy spirit, and labour of strenuous will; its gloom, for us to tint with some celestial light; its mysteries are for our worship; its sorrows for our trust; its perils for our courage; its temptations for our faith.—J. Martineau.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

MANSFIELD WORKHOUSE AND ESSEX HALL.

SIR,—I am one of many who regret that you have closed your columns against further correspondence from Mr. Fripp. His last letter shows signs of that constructive policy for which we have been waiting during the long destructive attack he has waged upon our ignorance and bigotry. We now begin to have a dim idea of what he is driving at. But alas! the moment a ray of light breaks through the obstinate darkness, you, Mr. Editor, step in and draw the blind. Reconsider, Sir, I pray you, your harsh and untimely decree!

For the first time Mr. Fripp announces that he is prepared to tolerate us all, provided we can satisfy him that we are "live" and "human." It seems a large and, some of Mr. Fripp's friends will think, a fatal admission. But, Sir, let your readers be in no haste to rush in through the wide-opened gates of Mr. Fripp's Catholicity. "Live" and "human" we all flatter ourselves we are. Observe, however, that Mr. Fripp puts his own meaning into these terms; consider the narrow dogmatism wherewith he defines "liveness" and "humanity"; mark the bigot's hoof glinting under the hem of his Catholic robe, the bigot's horns upstanding under his Catholic cowl!

"Liveness" and "humanity" Mr. Fripp does not indeed define openly by set terms, but covertly and dangerously by figures. He presents us with a type of the "live" man studied by him in the Mansfield Workhouse. Three characteristics mark the possessor of "liveness"—(1) he reads the Prayer-book; (2) he catches mice; (3) he catches them under his neighbour's bed. As to the "live" woman, her character is sketched by Mr. Fripp in somewhat scantier outline. All that we learn distinctly about her is that she smokes a pipe—in the Mansfield Workhouse.

These, Sir, are tests. While the tongue of Mr. Fripp is uttering sounding words of Catholicity, his hands are building high walls of exclusion against all liberty-loving souls. How many of us are "old poachers"? How many of us inherit "the Robin Hood tradition"? Some of us read our Prayer-books: but those who read their Prayer-books do not catch mice: and those who catch mice do not read their Prayer-books. True it is that none of us are precluded from acquiring these characteristics in the future—thanks to our great principle of Freedom. But Mr. Fripp seems to demand their immediate acquisition. He makes them tests of "liveness" and "humanity," which, says he, are the only qualities worthy of toleration. See, then, the outcome. We present ourselves at the gate of Mr. Fripp's Catholic fold and demand admission on the ground that we are "live" and "human." Vain hope! On the threshold, barring the way, stands the stern form of Mr. Fripp, Prayer-book in one hand, Mouse-trap in the other. "I know you not," he cries. "Ye are no true children of Robin Hood. Away into the outer darkness, ye mouseless pretenders to life."

Some readers of Mr. Fripp's letter will give to its figures a far subtler interpretation. Mansfield Workhouse, they will say, is intended for Essex Hall. The "old poacher" is the Secretary of the British and Foreign. The catching of mice under our neighbour's bed is the Forward Movement. "I have caught thirteen" is the Annual Report of the Association. On literary grounds I confess this seems to me the juster interpretation of Mr. Fripp's parable. It is, however, refuted by history. Mr. Fripp's personal progress from Essex Hall to the Mansfield Workhouse has been invested by him with so much of the character of a triumphal march as to leave no room for supposing that he regards the one as the type of the other. He intends them as antitheses, the one representing Egyptian bondage, the other the Promised Land. The first stands for a narrow sectarian ambition, the second for that large liberty in which men read their Prayer-book—and catch mice.

In the interpretation of symbolic language we must always remember our liability to error. We must disavow the pretence of infallibility. Such a disavowal, Sir, I would humbly make. But I am beset by a plain alternative: either Mr. Fripps' story of the visit to Mansfield Workhouse means what I have said, or it has nothing to do with the subject of his letter. In either case I must needs recall the beginning of an old story: "Once upon a time a mountain was in labour, and it brought forth a mouse."

L. P. JACKS.

[Mr. Jacks is mistaken in the first sentence of his letter. We have not closed our columns against further correspondence from Mr. Fripp. We have only closed a particular correspondence, which otherwise would have no end. But we cannot resist Mr. Jacks's plea. THE INQUIRER is sometimes reproached with being too serious, not to say——. Perhaps our critics will accept the above letter as a sop to Cerberus—or some other person.—ED. INQ.]

A MEMORIAL OF DR. MARTINEAU'S MINISTRY AT LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.

SIR,—The plans of the congregation of Little Portland-street with regard to the restoration of their chapel have now been accomplished, with one important exception. The renovation scheme has been satisfactorily carried through, and the chapel has been entirely redecorated, relighted, and reseated. It now remains to complete the scheme by the erection of some suitable memorial to Dr. Martineau within the building where he exercised his London ministry.

We feel sure that there must be many of Dr. Martineau's former hearers and admirers, now widely dispersed, who would wish to be associated with such a memorial, and we, therefore, confidently appeal for contributions to make it at once artistic and appropriate.

The proposal which has so far received most support has been that of placing in one of the panels at the north end of the chapel a marble tablet, bearing a head in relief of Dr. Martineau, with the dates of his birth and death, and a short record of his connection with this chapel.

It has further been proposed by some of Dr. Martineau's family that this opportunity should be taken of associating his colleague, Rev. J. J. Tayler, with this memorial. It would seem, therefore, suitable that a similar tablet should be placed in the corresponding panel, recording not only his short ministry, but his valuable and far-reaching work in founding the adjacent schools.

In order to carry out this scheme in a manner worthy of the object, a further considerable sum will be required, and we hope that this appeal will meet with a prompt response, so that the work may be set in hand and completed not long after the anniversary of Dr. Martineau's death.

Contributions to the Memorial Fund will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Treasurer, at 1, Gordon-square, W.C.

HENRIETTA BUSK, Hon. Treasurer.
ROBIN ROSCOE, Hon. Secretary.
HARRY S. PERRIS, Minister.

NOV. 21.

THE IBBETSON FUND: AN APPEAL.

SIR,—Some of your readers will doubtless recollect that in December, 1896, I made an appeal in your columns for subscriptions to enable me to give the sum of ten shillings weekly, for four years, to Mr. Seth Ibbetson, a lay-preacher in connection with the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, who was suffering from an incurable disease, and whose daughter, now twenty-one years of age, has been a helpless invalid from her childhood. A sufficient amount was raised for that purpose, and it has been a great boon to the family. Mr. Ibbetson died last January, but the weekly allowance has been continued to his widow and children up to the present.

As the Fund is now exhausted, I feel it my duty to appeal to the Unitarian public for a similar sum for the benefit of the invalid daughter who has to be attended to day and night. There is also a younger daughter, about eleven years of age, who is a delicate child and not likely to be able to earn her living for some years to come.

Any donations or yearly subscriptions sent to the undersigned will be thankfully received and duly acknowledged in THE INQUIRER.

The following contributors have kindly undertaken to renew their yearly subscriptions:—Misses Martineau, £5; Miss Brown, £2 12s.; Rev. E. S. Howse, B.A., £2 12s. E. CEREDIG JONES.

43, Blenheim-road, Bradford.

WE are glad to see that of the fifteen members elected to the Liverpool School Board Miss Florence Melly, one of the four Progressive and non-sectarian members, stands second on the list, with 52,909 votes. The poll was headed by Mr. George Wise, an ultra-Protestant champion, with 107,063 votes. (There are in Liverpool 105,201 electors on the roll.) After these two came the four Roman Catholic members, then two more non-sectarians, and only after them Canon Major Lester, Chairman of the old Board the first of the six Church members elected. The fourth non-sectarian candidate stood before the other five.

OBITUARY.

MR. WILLIAM COOK.

ON Saturday evening, Nov. 17, there passed away a very faithful and persistent worker for the Unitarian cause in East London. Mr. William Cook was seventy-five years of age, and has known the Unitarian missionary effort in East London from its commencement, working with Mr. Spears, Mr. Grant, and Mr. Phillips more than thirty years ago, and remaining a regular worshipper in the Stepney congregation till the Sunday before his death. He used to tell of the lectures and services held on Mile-end waste and in the Temperance Mission Hall near the "Paragon," and how those ministers and he have been pelted with stones on the vacant, unpaved piece of Mile-end-road, where dock strikes have been fostered and the Salvation Army born. He told of the large congregations which came in those "good old days," and of the removal from the Temperance Hall to the private rooms at "245" Mile-end-road, and then to the "converted cowshed" at the back of the house in which he died. Then there was the purchase of College Chapel and the successful ministries of Mr. Spears and Mr. Grant. Mr. Cook had been very feeble during the last year, but he never failed in attendance both at morning and evening service. He was one of the quiet, but plodding workers, whose regular attendance is such a comfort to the minister of a struggling church. For eighteen years he was treasurer for the congregation, and served on the Committee till the last. He will be very much missed at Stepney.

The burial service, which was conducted by Mr. Lucking Tavener, was held at the house of the deceased, and at the grave in Bow Cemetery.

MR. MOTI BULASA, B.A.

OUR readers will regret to learn of the death of Mr. Moti Bulasa, of Poona, the selected candidate for the Indian Scholarship at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Bulasa was a graduate of the Calcutta University, a member of the Prarthana Somaj, and a life-member of the Deccan Education Society, Poona. Mr. Justice Ranade, of Bombay, President of the Prarthana Somaj, Bombay, and Dr. R. G. Bhandarkar, President of the Prarthana Somaj, Poona, both wrote to the Joint Committee at Calcutta very warmly of Mr. Bulasa's character, religious earnestness, and intelligence. Dr. Datu G. Sabnis, of the Sassoon Hospital, Poona, certified in a letter, dated Feb. 12, 1900, that he was in good health and could safely undertake a journey to and a stay in England. Mr. Bulasa sailed from Bombay on September 16 in the s.s. Baldunio, of an Italian line, from Bombay to Genoa. He wrote to the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association that he expected to reach Genoa about Oct. 8, and said he would proceed to London by the overland route. A letter was sent to him to Genoa giving him instructions what to do on his arrival in London. Nothing further was heard of him, and after waiting a few days after the time he was due in London, inquiries were made through the London agents of the shipping firm. The firm replied that the Baldunio had reached Genoa, and had sailed back for Bombay on Oct. 18, but they would make inquiries from the chief office at Genoa about Mr. Bulasa. On Nov. 1, a letter was received stating that Mr. Bulasa had been landed ill at Port Said, and the company had heard nothing of him since. On receipt of this letter, Mr. Bowie wrote to the British Consul at Port Said asking if he would make inquiries, and let him know the result. In a letter dated Nov. 8, and received at Essex Hall on Nov. 16, the British Consul informed Mr. Bowie that Mr. Moti Bulasa died on Oct. 8 at the Lady Strangford Hospital, Port Said. The deceased was landed there on Oct. 1 from the Italian steamer Baldunio very ill with acute rheumatism. He deposited a sum of money with the doctor, and after his death this money was handed over to the British Consulate. After paying the funeral and other expenses the balance of the money was forwarded to Bombay as well as the personal effects of Mr. Bulasa. Mr. Bulasa was thirty years of age, and he leaves a wife, but no children. We desire to tender our deep sympathy with his relatives and friends in the sad loss which has befallen them.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Mountain and the Squirrel.

AMONGST the books that you are almost sure to read when you grow up are the works of Emerson. He was what people call a "philosopher," and there are some who think he was one of the wisest men the world has ever seen. That he was as good and gentle as he was wise, that he was dearly loved by rich and poor, that he was the deepest thinker America has ever had, are facts which you will do well to remember, even though it may be a long time before you will come to read and enjoy his books. Most of Emerson's writings are difficult to fully understand, as your fathers and mothers will tell you, and his poetry is especially so; but there happens to be one little piece he wrote which is so simple that you might almost think he wrote it for some little children much younger than yourselves. Here it is:—

Fable.

The mountain and the squirrel
Had a quarrel;
And the former called the latter "Little Prig."
Bun replied:
"You are doubtless very big;
But all sorts of things and weather
Must be taken in together,
To make up a year
And a sphere.
And I think it no disgrace
To occupy my place.
If I'm not so large as you,
You are not so small as I,
And not half so spry.
I'll not deny you make
A very pretty squirrel track;
Talents differ; all is well and wisely put;
If I cannot carry forests on my back,
Neither can you crack a nut."

There seems nothing very difficult to understand about that, does there? Yet we find that a great deal of trouble is caused amongst people because there are so many who cannot be got to remember that it takes, as the proverb says, all sorts of people to make a world. You have heard of the man who tried to make people all the same length, laying them on a bed which was just his size, cutting off the legs of those who were too long, and stretching out the poor folk who happened to be too short. That is what those who cannot understand the uses of differences are always trying to do; not that any one goes about chopping off legs or pulling them to make them longer, but that they are always trying to make people think and act exactly as they do themselves.

Of course we all must try and get people to go in what we feel to be the best ways, but we have to learn, and it is not at all an easy lesson, that there is plenty of room always to be left for what Paul calls "diversities of gifts." One boy likes reading and hates cricket. The book seems to him so charming, the game so slow; but it would be foolish for him to scoff at his friends who do not share his likings. Both tastes are good, both recreations are useful. One girl can sing and paint, and another can do neither, but knows how to amuse the baby and keep it quiet; again one must not despise the other, the gifts are divided and all are useful in their place. What a monotonous (look in the dictionary and see what that word really means) world it would be if we all thought alike, dressed in the same colours, had the same hobbies, and generally were copies of each other. If it were all mountains or all squirrels, how really dull life would become. Fortunately God has not made it so. Whenever you feel inclined to grumble because everybody's ways are not your ways, just remember that nowhere in all the world has anyone been able to discover two things exactly alike.

You've heard people say "As like as two peas," but then two peas never are exactly alike. Take a microscope, examine them, and you will find great differences. Every leaf is different from every other leaf, every grain of sand from its neighbour, and most certainly no two human beings were ever exactly alike.

It is very tempting for the strong and big to think that all should come up to their standard—that is for the mountain to think that squirrels are quite useless things—but the world wants other qualities besides those of strength and bigness; there is room for talents which cannot be found save in another class of creatures altogether.

Emerson's fable learn by heart, and remember whenever you find yourself wishing that everyone was like yourself, that perhaps it is a good thing they are not; that where you are weak others may excel, just as they seem to fail where you are strongest; imagine you have the voice of the squirrel:

If I cannot carry forests on my back,
Neither can you crack a nut.

ARTHUR HARVIE.

WITH reference to the late Mr. Alfred Henry Lawrence, M.A., whose death we recorded last week, Mr. Courtney Kenny, of Downing College, Cambridge, sent the following interesting note to The Times:—

For the benefit of future historians of University life, it is worth noting that he was the author of a little volume ("Reminiscences of Cambridge Life," by O. C.; London, 1889), which gives, within the compass of less than 200 pages, the most minute and accurate picture known to me of an undergraduate's daily doings. Like the Paston Letters, it has, from the minuteness of its graphic details, an historical value which the lapse of years will steadily enhance. Unhappily, his lifelong struggle against the effects of an accident which he sustained in his boyhood, and which ultimately caused his death, prevented him from ever completing the more ambitious literary tasks that he at one time contemplated.

ENGLISH EDUCATION.

OUR first word in the present article must be to call attention to that which follows—the article by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE on the "London School Board Election." We had intended that our Leader this week should be devoted to that subject, calling attention to the magnitude of the interests involved and the seriousness of the issue, if by any mishap or lack of public attention and determination at the polls on Thursday next, the Progressive policy of the Board during the past three years should now be reversed. But Mr. BOWIE has said so fully and so admirably what needs to be said on this subject, that it is not necessary to add any further words, and it remains for us simply to ask the earnest attention of our readers for his article.

That being so, we are glad to have this opportunity of referring to another matter, immediately bearing on the same great interest of the efficient education of our children. The St. James's Gazette of Friday, Nov. 16, in a leading article headed "A Word to School Board Electors," referred to a lecture delivered at the Sesame Club on the previous Wednesday by Mr. A. SONNENSCHEIN, on "How to learn to read," fully reported on another page of the Gazette; and the same subject was referred to in Monday's Daily News.

For more than thirty years Mr. SONNENSCHEIN has been advocating a rational method of teaching to read (it was in 1869 that Messrs. MACMILLAN first published SONNENSCHEIN and MEIKLEJOHN'S series of books, "The English Method of Teaching to Read")—a method which has been proved by experience to accomplish in a few months what in the schools of this country is apt to take three or four years; but although the principles thus clearly and fully worked out have been to some extent adopted in other reading-books, there has been no general reform, and the strength of teachers and the precious time of the children continue to be wasted, because of the slowness of the English mind to adapt itself to new methods, and to realise the vital interests at stake.

"The contrast presented by the Continent in this respect," says the St. James's Gazette, "is not creditable to English intelligence" :—

> Italian children learn to read easily in three or four months, and French and German children in less than a year. English is not a more difficult language for a native to learn to read than German, and is distinctly less difficult than French. Why do our boys and girls take three or four times longer to learn than the children of the Continent? Simply because our method of teaching is utterly unscientific. Mr. Sonnenschein has elaborated a system which is scientific; in which simplification is the result of classification; and he has found by experience that average English children taught by his method can learn to read in six or seven months with greater ease and fluency than the Board-school pupil in three or four years. This is not a matter that can be dismissed as the theory of a faddist. It is a simple fact proved by experiment. And in view of the experience of the Continent it is not surprising. The length of time consumed in learning to read in this country requires explanation. Why, then, has Mr. Sonnenschein's method not been adopted long ago in every elementary school? When an inventor makes a contrivance for hastening locomotion or improving lighting it is taken in hand and applied to those purposes. When we are shown how to save time and labour in education we let year after year pass without taking any notice. We debate the question of raising the school age, or of doing this, that, and the other for the sake of giving some education beyond the elements to the children of the country. And all the time we might if we chose solve half the problems of elementary education by exercising a small amount of intelligence. The exceedingly simple method propounded by Mr. Sonnenschein has been procurable for years past in a little series of cheap primers published by Messrs. Macmillan. It is perfectly well known at the Education Office, and has been approved—as, indeed, it could not fail to be by any person who had given the matter a moment's serious attention—by the leading educational authorities. Why does the Education Office not recommend these primers for use in Board-schools? Simply because our culpably timid authorities shrink from giving the weight of their sanction to books produced by any particular firm of publishers. Rather than do so they waste the money of every ratepayer in the kingdom, and the time and labour of every child in the schools. We have no hesitation in asserting that if the London School Board were to insist on the general adoption of the Sonnenschein method of teaching reading, they would introduce one of the most important educational reforms brought about since the Act of 1870.

This plea of the St. James's Gazette is strongly enforced by the report of Mr. SONNENSCHEIN'S lecture, and, we may add, by a full discussion of the subject which took place last year at Cardiff, and particularly in the columns of the Western Mail. Mr. SONNENSCHEIN'S system is based on the "syllabic" as opposed to the "literal" method of learning to read. The child instead of struggling with awkward English letters, the names of which are quite different from the sounds they represent, begins by growing familiar with the simplest syllables and one-syllable words, learning at the same time to write whatever is read, and so advancing to more complex forms, gains very soon a surprising facility in mentally taking to pieces and reading off the most difficult words. Mr. SONNENSCHEIN, as reported in the Gazette, gave the following instance :—

> Mr. Sonnenschien lately showed the work of a boy taught by this method to Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools at the Education Office, and this high educational official, amazed at the results exhibited, was utterly incredulous when assured that the boy in question was by no means a pupil of exceptional ability. This child began to learn to read on Feb. 14 of the present year, with the first course described above—at, et, it, ot, ut. By the end of the month he could read, and write from dictation (not copying) such sentences as "Do not push my kid into the bush." After two months' teaching he could similarly write correctly from dictation a sentence of such questionable accuracy as "From London to Chatham and Dover is a quick run and quickly over." On May 3 he spontaneously produced an original composition in the shape of a little story; and by the middle of June—i.e., after four months from commencing his lessons in reading, he was able to take up and read with ease any page of a distinctly advanced collection of stories, which included selections from Grimm's Tales.

We happen to have a speaking acquaintance with the boy in question. Before entering on the course in February he had gone through the "Nursery Book" with his mother (a book which includes all words of two letters, and a few others), but he had no other preparation, and we can vouch for the rapidity and ease with which he made the progress above described, and for the pleasure with which, as a boy of seven, he now reads simple books to himself.

This question of the right method of learning to read is now attracting a considerable amount of attention. Right method in the first steps of education cannot fail to lead to further reform, and we are glad to take this humble part in urging the importance of the matter.

To know that nothing fails except the false is to hold the key of life's profoundest secret.—Henry Frank.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD ELECTION.

The editor of The Inquirer has invited me to lay some facts and figures before its readers which might interest them in the London School Board, and cause such of them as are electors to record their votes on Thursday next, Nov. 29. There are good reasons why people everywhere should be interested in London; stronger reasons why those who live and work in London should take some pains to assure themselves that its educational parliament shall be ruled, and its policy guided, by men and women who have no denominational or sectarian interests to serve.

London is the greatest city in the world. It is difficult to realise its greatness. Its vast and varied needs baffle description. Wealth and poverty, leisure and toil, happiness and misery are massed together in the metropolis as nowhere else on the face of the globe. It is the most interesting city in the world, because of the large place it holds in the eyes of nations, and because of the great human concerns which have their centre within its borders. The size and population of London are overwhelming. The distance from Highgate Hill and Hampstead Heath on the north, to the Crystal Palace in the south, is upwards of twelve miles; while the journey straight across from Plumstead Common in the south-east to Putney Heath in the south-west is more than sixteen miles: the area with which the School Board has to deal is nearly 120 square miles. Within these boundaries five millions of people have to be housed and fed and governed. One is in constant danger of losing oneself in this vastness, and the sense of a common citizenship is difficult to cultivate. And yet it is of supreme importance that the people of London should cultivate the civic imagination, create an ideal city, and then work for its realisation.

There are few better or more practicable ways of doing this than by taking an interest and a share in the work of the London School Board. For Parliamentary purposes London has fifty-nine members, or if the University is included sixty members; for County Council administration there are 120 members; and the twenty-eight new boroughs with their mayors, which have taken the place of the old vestries, have in all 1,362 members, not including the aldermen, and excluding the City with its Common Council and Lord Mayor. The School Board Divisions remain unchanged. The whole metropolitan area is divided into eleven School Board districts, each of which returns a fixed number of members, the total number being fifty-five. When it is remembered that these fifty-five men and women are responsible for the attendance at school of 885,000 children, and for the education of 550,000 of these children, it will be self-evident that if they attempt to do their duty they must lead a busy life. These children are taught by 10,500 adult teachers in nearly 500 separate school buildings. In addition to the ordinary schools, there are upwards of 300 smaller buildings for teaching cookery, laundry and housewifery to girls, and 165 manual training centres for boys. There are eight schools for the blind, nineteen for the deaf, fifty for the physically and mentally defective, and six industrial schools for waifs and strays, truants and criminals. Pupil teachers receive education in twelve centres; and there are nearly 400 evening continuation schools.

The amount of money expended by the London School Board is, of course, enormous. It takes £7 to purchase the little bit of land needed to provide a school place for a single London child, £14 for erecting the building, and 11s. each for the furniture; and having provided the place, it costs £4 7s. a year to pay for the education each child receives. About 30s. of the annual cost of this education comes from the national purse in the form of grants, and the balance is found by the people of London. The total annual expenditure for all purposes does not fall far short of three millions sterling—teachers' salaries alone require about £1,500,000. The "Moderates" are busy declaring that they could and would reduce the expenditure, if they were once again returned in a majority. The following extract from Sir Charles Elliott's article in the Nineteenth Century for October is a sufficient reply to this plea:—

> To me it seems that the idea of carrying on the education of London children at any considerable reduction below the present cost—any reduction, that is, which would give a sensible relief to the ratepayer—is chimerical.

During the twelve years I have served as a member of the Board, I have never observed any keenness on the part of the denominational party for economical administration, unless the real or supposed interests of some sectarian school happened to be at stake. Faults and errors there must be at times in carrying on such a vast work, but the fundamental principle underlying what is called the "Progressive" policy contrasted with the "Moderate" policy is this: Those who take the name of Progressive endeavour to shape their policy in the interest of the community as a whole, without any reference to church, or sect, or party; whereas the Moderates, as a party, never seem able to shake themselves free of their denominationalism. In consequence of this, the Moderates frequently oppose the acquisition of sites, the building of schools, the improvement of education, in order that they may preserve and protect overcrowded, ill-ventilated, badly-equipped Church schools.

The London School Board, therefore, needs at least a majority of men and women who possess enough largeness of mind and breadth of sympathy to carry them outside and beyond all denominational and sectarian limitations. This is the way to make sure that there will be no renewal of sectarian strife and theological wrangling such as disgraced the Board six years ago. The battle for freedom was bravely and vigorously fought in those days, and the victory was indeed great. I rejoice that I was in the thick of the fight, and that I was able to render some effectual help in securing the defeat of an aggressive and intolerant clericalism. I do not myself anticipate any revival of the former controversy—certainly not in the bald, tactless form presented by Mr. Athelstan Riley; but the danger to freedom and progress is still serious, and those who desire that clericalism should be kept out of the people's schools must beware of indifference and carelessness at the forthcoming election. Among the candidates there are fortunately many stalwart supporters of freedom of reason and conscience. I need only mention the names of Miss Eve, Mrs. Homan, Miss McKee, Mrs. Maitland, Miss Morten, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Macdonald, Lord Morpeth, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Stanley, and Mr. Wallas, in order to show how strong the Progressives are on the side of liberty of thought for the teachers, and freedom from dogma for the scholars. Indeed, I might simply repeat the whole list of Progressive candidates, for Church of England clergymen, like Mr. Headlam and Mr. Jephson, are equally with the others opposed to every form of sectarianism in Board schools. Let every reader of these lines who has any influence or vote in London see to it that he uses it in order to secure the return of men and women who place in the forefront of their election addresses the education, health, and welfare of London's young, growing citizens, without distinction of Church or sect.

There are some people who seem to think that the children of working men and women are receiving too much education—that they are being rendered unfit for the positions in life which they were intended to occupy. I do not make any profession of knowing what position in life God intended any of His children to fill. I certainly do not believe He arranged that the human race should live in castes or classes. The way should be kept open for intelligence and character to grow, whether the boy or girl be the child of rich or of poor parents. As far as possible, there should be equality of opportunity. There are wide differences of capacity and intelligence, wider varieties of circumstances and surroundings, which will prevent some from ever rising very far, no matter what we say or do; but it is the duty of every lover of freedom, every faithful believer in brotherhood, to attempt to remove the obstacles, and to open the path of Knowledge to all who are able and prepared to walk therein. This is one of the ways in which we may help to enrich and ennoble the world.

Perhaps you will allow me to add a concluding word. A correspondent in last week's Inquirer tells us that in order to escape from Unitarianism he betook himself to the Poor-house that he might thus get into touch with something human and divine. If Unitarianism lies like a heavy load on any man's soul, the sooner he gets rid of it the better. I only want to say that for twelve years I have given largely of my strength and time for the sake of London and its children, with the object not of escaping from my Unitarianism, but rather with the desire to put into practice something of the broad, generous, helpful religion which I had learned from Unitarian teachers, prophets, and saints. Nor has my position as the Secretary of a Unitarian Association stood in the way of the friendliest co-operation and the warmest friendship with men and women of many creeds and of none. Perhaps this is owing to an early and deeply formed determination to devote myself to ministering to the varied living needs of men, and to beware of entangling myself in finely spun controversies and theories which only strangle effort, destroy enthusiasm, and render one's life and work of no avail or use to anyone.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE annual autumn meeting of this Society, preceded by a pleasant soirée, was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 15. There was a good attendance, which would have been larger if other congregational engagements had not fallen on the same evening. At eight o'clock the chair was taken by the President, Sir J. T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P., who was supported on the platform by the Revs. Charles Hargrove and F. W. Stanley, Messrs. P. W. Clayden, Hahnemann Epps and G. H. Clennell, hon. sec. Letters regretting their inability to be present had been received from the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and E. M. Daplyn, Mr. I. M. Wade, and others.

The PRESIDENT, referring to the character of that meeting as largely social, expressed his pleasure at being present, and as a measure of his interest, mentioned that he had come up to town for no other purpose, and should return home on the following morning. In the earlier part of the evening a lady had said to him: "How Unitarians do talk!" That, he thought, was one of their merits. Almost every Sunday now he was happy to be among his own people, and both before and after service it was pleasant to notice how heartily glad they are to see one another. He then told a story of Lord Salisbury's once having strayed into a Wesleyan chapel, and as an unrecognised stranger having been so warmly greeted, that he remarked afterwards it was no wonder the Wesleyans were successful. He concluded by once more expressing his good wishes for the work of the Society.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE said that when he was invited to come up and speak at that meeting, he was asked specially for some words of cheer and encouragement for their London ministers; but for that purpose he was afraid they had asked the wrong man. They should have got such a one as their dear friend Robert Collyer, an inveterate optimist, who even if he came to see you on your death-bed would tell you a good story and make you die smiling; he or that other optimist Brooke Herford could have told them all was well, and have made them feel happy and prosperous. As to himself, he could not object to their optimism; but if he were to speak as they would, he should be a false prophet and a flatterer; his nature was different from theirs. Proceeding to speak of the condition of their churches throughout the country, he said that everywhere he heard the same complaints, that there had formerly been a better time, or expectations had not been fulfilled. There were in his opinion three things that they lacked. The first was distinguished laymen. He could not say in the Chairman's presence that there were none. But though they still had laymen noble-hearted and true to the cause, yet it must be admitted that there was a lack of such. Many who formerly had held distinguished positions and had been the strength of their churches were gone and had left no representatives behind them. But secondly, they lacked numbers. Their churches were perhaps better filled than fifty years ago; yet filled was hardly the right word to use. And thirdly, they lacked able and devoted ministers. He did not mean that many of their ministers were not such; but there were not enough of them to fill the pulpits.

To account for these defects he gave two reasons. The first was that they had no Church. They were members of this or that chapel, under this or that minister, but there was no Church in a larger sense to which they belonged. He should be delighted, if only they had an "Open Brotherhood" of which they could be members, to which, go where they might, they would still belong. What they needed was a Church, not merely a congregation, but a broader society, localised in different places. As it was he often found that good earnest members of a congregation, when they left the town, fell out of the connection, because they lacked the sense of belonging to a Church, to which anywhere they were bound to be true. That was one cause of their failure. And the second reason he alleged was that they had no religion—nothing they could call their common religion, a common faith and worship. They had a common un-faith. They all disbelieved in the Trinity, and a number of other things; but no common faith possessed them, uniting them in one enthusiasm for the truth. Lacking those two things they were weak, and always struggling and complaining—suffering from anæmia. It was easy to find fault. But what was the remedy? and where must they look for encouragement? If a man had no faith, he had better be silent, and if a minister, he had better find some other employment. There was no strength in un-faith. But if they did believe, they must be of good heart, for truth was on their side. There were times when there was an ebb of the tide, when truth, justice and right seemed to go back. To some of them it seemed that such had been the case since the year 1880. Yet who would not rather be in the smallest company on the side of truth, than joined to great multitudes and be in error? If they were convinced that their Unitarian faith was the truth, and the doctrines commonly received were mistakes, they must thank God they did not believe them. And if they were condemned to preach to a few, or to worship with a few, they must count that a part of their suffering for the truth, which joined them to the company of the martyrs who had so much more to endure. To ministers he said, their business was to bear witness to the truth. He repeated what he had once before said in that place, they were not shopkeepers, whose business it was to get customers. It was not their business, as ministers, to fill churches a successful minister was not one who filled his church, but one who bore witness to the truth. If they were themselves absolutely convinced they would impart conviction to others. That which made the ritualists so devoted was not ritual but conviction. And so in the former days of their old Presbyterian chapels, when they were crowded and people stood outside by the windows to listen; the sermons and the prayers were very long, but the people were fired with conviction. Their present need was of men as ministers who themselves believed, and congregations united together not by a spirit of denial, which was ineffective for any work, but by the spirit of faith.

Mr. P. W. CLAYDEN said that he had some difficulty in following Mr. Hargrove. He had great admiration for his zeal and earnestness, and would again repeat the admiration he had already expressed for Mr. Hargrove's American letters in THE INQUIRER. But he had hoped Mr. Hargrove had come back from the States not only convinced that Unitarians were right in calling their places of worship Unitarian, but also with a little of that optimism with which the condition of those churches had filled his own mind. He confessed to being an optimist, and took a very different view from Mr. Hargrove. He did not think their churches were in a state of degeneration. As an instance to the contrary he referred to the recent revival of the congregation at Boston, where he had preached his first sermon forty-five years ago. Neither could he agree with Mr. Hargrove's wish to belong to a Church. They all belonged to the Church of the first-born, whose name is written in the heavens. That was enough for him. Every Christian man and woman belonged to that invisible Church of Christ, the Church of the living God. No external organisation was necessary. He was formerly a member of an Independent Church at Bath, and when he removed to London he was transferred by a letter from the Church in Bath to one in Kentish Town. That arrangement answered among the Congregationalists and the Baptists, and it was all they as Unitarians needed. He could not admit any want of success. They had too materialistic a measure of success. If filling chapels was success, that was denied them; but their theology, the Unitarian view of Christianity, was everywhere gaining on the old orthodoxy. In a remarkable book, recently published, containing sixteen essays on the Atonement, which had appeared in the Christian World newspaper, fourteen of them at least were attempts to explain away the old doctrine. The truths they had been standing for were beginning by permeation to fill the other churches. That was the destiny of Unitarian Christianity, to leaven the other churches. The doctrine of the Incarnation, of which so much was now said, was the worst heresy of the Christian Church, because it took away that divine nature which belonged to every one, and concentrated it on one who lived 1900 years ago. Thus men and women lost their divinity in magnifying their Master. What he wanted was to feel that he was a son of God, that his nature was divine, that he belonged to the Infinite. As Unitarians they could look around on the whole universe and say,

My Father made them all.

The belief that He is a Father and that nothing could part His children from Him was an emancipating truth, which would lift them over all the difficulties of the time and make death when it came not altogether sad and unwelcome. If they could impress that truth upon themselves and their children they had in their hands the greatest possible lever for the elevation of mankind. What Mr. Hargrove said at the end of his speech was a satisfactory reply to what he had said at the beginning. They had made a large spiritual success, infinitely more than any material success. The best work they could do for their generation, the best religious work (it was a lesson he had learnt many years ago from their friend, Brooke Herford), was to raise up a Unitarian congregation where one did not already exist, to open a church where men and women could feel that the doctrines taught were in harmony with modern science, where they would not hear anything to make them uncharitable to friends and neighbours or disposed to resist the progress of scientific thought in the world. Huxley had once said to his friend Charles Kingsley that scientific men looked upon orthodoxy as the rest of men looked upon Brahmanism. It was their function, which they largely performed, to enable men who could not believe the orthodox doctrines to come into their churches and find that it made no difference, that they could worship the Father, and feel themselves His children; and whatever new light might come, it could in no way disturb their relation to their Father or make them feel that religion was not a reality in the world.

Mr. HAHNEMANN EPPS, Chairman of the Committee, then made a statement as to the work of the Society, pointing out the progress that had been made since their last general meeting in the spring. The position had been greatly improved, and the end of the century would see the London churches with their debts paid and plans in an advanced state for the extension of church buildings and other provision for the enlargement of congregational work. At Bermondsey there was good hope of improvement, through the most welcome and generous offer of Mr. E. Howard, who was to take responsible charge of the congregation during the winter months, from the reopening on the 25th inst. Mr. Epps then read the appeal made by Mr. Howard for help of various descriptions, published in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 10, and gave further particulars of the steps of progress proposed at Lewisham and Plumstead, Kentish Town, Forest Gate, Wood Green, and Mansford-street. The success of the Bazaar was proving of eminent assistance. They had now £4,200 available for paying off debts, and £9,000 for loans on new buildings. The Committee desired to thank most heartily all who had organised and carried out the Bazaar.

Mr. CLAYDEN added a word of warm appreciation of Mr. Howard's services at Hastings, at which he had been present, which he felt augured well for Bermondsey.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY, proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Hargrove for his address, confessed himself an optimist. But looking on their churches with the most hopeful heart, they yet found many things hard to bear. They had difficulties which no other denomination had. No one who had not been for some years in the ministry could understand the forces that were against them, and especially in provincial towns. But they had to stand boldly forward working for the future. They must not look for visible results, but must make the best of what they had about them. Every church was a spiritual home to its members, and they had to be united and do the best that was in their power. They could not worship elsewhere; they must stand together feeling they had a duty to themselves and to their neighbours. They must work from the strength they had, to make their religion real.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, seconding the motion, said that their weakness lay in the indifference with which their professed friends regarded public worship, which led others to regard their worship as having no significance or real power over their lives. Larger faith was what they wanted. Men of faith were men of power. If they had it, they would have more earnestness.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the motion, said he had heard Mr. Hargrove with great pleasure and sympathy. He did not enjoy empty places of worship, and as he had seen their beautiful new church in Liverpool filling more and more, he found it a warmer and happier place to be in. He cordially sympathised with the desire to increase the visible number of Unitarians. Mr. Hargrove had said there was not the same number of distinguished laymen as a generation or two ago. But it was the ministers who made the distinguished laymen, not the laymen who made the ministers. Let them keep the young people and then, brought up among Unitarians, they might come to be distinguished. They had been told their ministers were not shopkeepers. That was undoubtedly right. But he had often thought that they who were customers might recommend their friends to come. The older he grew, the more it seemed to him a duty to bring friends and neighbours in.

He then put the resolution, which was cordially passed, and Mr. HARGROVE, in acknowledging it, repeated that the one thing they wanted was faith—faith in the Unseen, the God whom they called on men to worship as their Father in heaven.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. S. S. TAYLER and seconded by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, brought the meeting to a close.

LOVE, THE REDEEMER.

BY THE LATE MRS. F. TEASDALE REED.

SEE the newborn infant. All its organs are perfect, but it has not learnt to use them, and, with eyes and ears, feet and hands, it is as though it had them not. It might lie and die. But Love tends it and nourishes it, and cares for it, and the feebleness gives place to vigour, and, as the body grows, the spirit finds the way to use its various powers, and so on through the years until the atom of humanity has developed into the statesman, the historian, the poet, the philanthropist. Look at Laura Bridgeman. Deprived of sight, of hearing, of the power of speech, Love patiently tries, and succeeds, in making her hear, teaches her to make known her thoughts in writing, educates her mind in various ways, until now she, so apparently helpless herself, is a power for help and comfort to numbers of her fellow-creatures.

Take the case of the little American girl who, born into a wealthy family, proved to be deaf and dumb. Money provided the means which love and patience carried into effect, and she was taught to speak words she could never hear, and education trained her thoughts and furnished her mind with ideas. She became bright and intelligent, and took a keen interest in life. When about ten years old, she came to know of a little boy who, like her, was born deaf and dumb, but his parents were poor. His mother died, and his father could do nothing for him, and put him into the workhouse; here he was kept in bed to keep him out of danger; the consequence was that neither mind nor body had a chance of developing. Her sympathies were strongly excited, and she determined to try and help him. She set about trying to interest others in his case, succeeded in obtaining contributions in response to her own written appeals, and herself went with a friend to see what could be done. They tried to win this almost dehumanised little being, who kicked, and screamed, and struggled, this victim of strong animal powers without a controlling spirit. After agonies of patient striving, one small step was gained. Thus encouraged her efforts were patiently continued, until the lad's higher nature was touched and his mental powers were awakened so that he was able to profit by the instruction given him in an institution. After a few years, he and his similarly circumstanced helper met once more, he this time in his right mind, a wonderfully clever lad, and they held a conversation which only their friends could hear, but which each could mentally appreciate. Was not Love the redeemer in this case? If the poor little deaf and dumb motherless waif had been abandoned to its fate, let imagination picture its after life of misery.

And what should we be if we were not constantly attended—waited on—by redeeming Love?

We wilfully take a turning which can only lead to harm, find serious obstacles, and at last are overcome and forced to retrace our steps; later it appears we had been thus saved from destruction. Love, divine and human, had been "watching us to bless."

"The whole creation waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God."

My friends, we are the sons of God, you and I, who say "Our Father, who art in heaven." But does it seem so? The creation waiteth for the manifestation—the world around, the world of Nature, the world of mankind waits, looks longingly, earnestly, to see in us the likeness to our Father—to see His purity, His truthfulness, above all, His sympathising love and helpfulness.

Then as they see it they will be changed into the same image, the vision of beauty will be reflected yet more brightly as the years go by, and reflected again and again for ever, and the world's yearning will be satisfied, and the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God. But the first step is for each one to do his part, to develop the likeness in himself—it is there, bring it out yet more clearly every day. Keep the mirror in your own soul polished brightly even at the cost of trouble or pain, that you may reflect more clearly the brightness, the loveliness of your Father's character.

For the Children.

One day when I was walking out, there were some children playing at the side of the path. Just in that place the water had lain, and the earth was soft—what do you think the children were doing? Making mud-pies and such things. Now I wonder whose children they were. Were they the Queen's? or the Prince of Wales's? or a Duke's? or a Lord's?

No? Why do you think so? Because rich people's children would not be allowed to play like that with mud. It would not be proper.

Now only think of it: you and I, we all, are the children of God. God who is so wise, and so kind, and so good, is our Father; and we must do only what is proper.

It won't do for us to tell lies, because our Father is the God of truth. It won't do for us to be cruel or unkind, because He is the God of love. It won't do for us to be idle or lazy, because our Father is always at work and does all His work well. No, we must be industrious, truthful, honest, gentle, and good, that every one may see to whose family we belong. I have seen children sometimes and could guess whose they were, because they were like the father or mother. Sometimes I see someone who is gentle and loving, and I remember that she is just like what her mother used to be. So we must all try to be every day like our Father in Heaven.

A LOST BEQUEST.

WARRENPOINT, CO. DOWN.

THE Unitarian congregation here is passing through a time of anxiety and adversity in regard to financial circumstances. Twenty-two years ago, Miss Susan Hancock, a devoted member of the church, by her will left an annuity of £20 for the support of the minister, and payable out of her freehold estate during the life-time of her sister, Mrs. Lucinda Brown. This endowment was regularly paid till Mrs. Brown's death in September, 1899, by which much regretted event the congregation not only lost a greatly respected member, but a difference was made in their church income, amounting to, including the lapsed annuity, quite £30 per annum. This is not the only loss they have sustained. The above-mentioned Miss Hancock, in addition to the annuity, bequeathed to the church house property, the yearly rental of which amounts to £60—the bequest not to take effect till the death of Mrs. Brown. When that occurred the trustees entered into possession, as they were advised by the executors, in due course of law.

Now, however, they have been informed by the solicitor to the executors that "it has been discovered" that the bequest in question was void, according to the law of Ireland, the testatrix having died within three months of the date of her will. They are required not only to surrender the property, but to repay the rents received for one year. They have been favoured with legal advice of the highest authority as to the point of law involved, and there is little doubt that the property must be considered lost.

Thus the cherished wish of the two ladies to provide for the maintenance of the congregation has, from no fault of theirs, been defeated; and the matter is rendered the more regrettable by the certainty which all who knew them feel that if either or both of them had known of the point of law aforesaid they would have provided for the congregation in other ways so as to avoid the failure of their benevolent intentions. But as things are the congregation are confronted with a loss of income amounting to quite £70 altogether, and of freehold property valued at about £1,000.

It is pleasant to add that the members have bravely faced the difficulty. Two-thirds of them have doubled their annual contribution, a few even more. It has also been resolved to raise a special fund to enable them to meet legal expenses and as an auxiliary means of support for the next few years. To this fund the members are contributing according to their ability. But none of them are wealthy, and they must trust to some extent to the sympathy and help of friends of Unitarian Christianity beyond the locality.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IN writing this report of the condition and prospects of our churches in Yorkshire at the close of the nineteenth century, there is present to my mind a reader whose grandparents are perhaps yet unborn, or certainly but little children now, some successor of mine at Mill Hill, or may-be of one of my colleagues at Bradford, Sheffield, or elsewhere, whom a future editor will have pressed into the service of a future INQUIRER. I think of him hunting out in the bottom shelves of some old library the dust-covered volume which has been pushed further and further into obscurity as one after another up to ninety-and-nine its successors multiplied. Long years it has been neglected, no reader's hands have turned its pages nor prying eyes interested themselves in its contents; summers and autumns and winters have brought it no change, only in the cruel relentless spring has it year by year suffered outrage in the rude grasp of housekeeper, who knew it only as "one of those books," and inquired of it only how much dust had accumulated on its outside.

And now, in November of the year 2000, its long slumbers are disturbed by a friendly hand, and its pages are turned again. Old memories revive of the time a hundred years ago, before yet it had got together in bound volume, when it was greeted Saturday by Saturday as it came to hand, and lay upon the table in sitting-room and library, and was read and talked about by young and old. The Index is consulted. "Yorkshire?" No; "Reports?" No! yet the great antiquarian of that day who knew all that was to be known of the old Unitarianism had referred him to THE INQUIRER for an account such as he sought of the Yorkshire churches a hundred years ago. At last, here it is under "Provincial Letters." The compiler of the Index might have saved him the trouble of looking through all the letters to find the one he was interested in, but the compiler probably had not him in mind.

And he carries off the volume to read it in peace, and blesses the writer (if he be a man of grateful mind) for having furnished him with so much copy to his need. "A hundred years ago," he begins, "Unitarianism in Yorkshire seems to have been in a fairly flourishing condition, if at least we may rely upon a report contributed to THE INQUIRER of that time by a former minister of Leeds." But hold there, brother mine, your "if" is a most prudent caution. No, you must rely upon me only so far that I tell no lies; what I have written is what I knew or believed to be true. If you in your day have all kinds of discouragements, disappointments, failures, stupidities, indifferences to contend with, be sure we had the same in our day. Don't write about the superior virtues and greater zeal and consequent success of "our forefathers"; we were just what you are, and what they were who came a hundred years before us. We make the best of things in our reports, as every society and every church does: we don't parade our griefs and scandals for material of unfriendly gossip. We write the truth and nothing but the truth, but we do not promise the whole truth.

So I think I would warn my ministerial successor. (Will they by that time have decided by what name he is to call himself? Will he be resigned to the name "Unitarian minister," or never have borne it?) Every church, even the most popular and successful, has its troubles and difficulties, and we have ours, which we do our best to contend with silently.

Since I came to Yorkshire, now nearly a quarter of a century ago, we have had some heavy losses, and there has certainly been no corresponding gain. We have no laymen of position to fill the posts left vacant by Mr. Joseph Lupton and Mr. George Buckton, who were so long President and Treasurer of our Union. We have good men and true with us still. If they failed altogether, we might as well close our chapel doors. We have in Mr. Grosvenor Talbot a President whose name is held in honour throughout our churches; but there is not the confidence and zeal there used to be. It is not that the later generation are wanting in the good qualities of their fathers; but they have come in for experiences which are not encouraging. They have been brought up to expect so much more than has come to pass, and they secretly question how far it is worth while to support a cause which does not succeed.

We have at the present time an unusual number of vacant pulpits. In Mr. Slater Pudsey has lost an eminently faithful minister, who set us all example of persevering devotion to his duties. The church at Dewsbury has been without a minister since Mr. Boughey left, and for the last three months has been closed. For Pudsey we have no anxiety, except that the congregation may as soon as possible get a pastor worthy of their trust; if such be found, they will work with him faithfully and harmoniously. Dewsbury is our trouble. We need there a strong man, who shall be appointed by and responsible to the Union Committee. He must be a man of ability and a good preacher, for it is a congregation which is critical and will not put up with rhetorical commonplace for more than the few months which exhaust it. Such men are not easy to find, and easily enough find for themselves pulpits where there is more promise of peace and plenty than Dewsbury can hold out. We are on the look-out, if it be possible, to obtain a minister who shall be a not unworthy successor of Mr. Howe, Mr. Crowther Hirst, Mr. Brinkworth, and others who have done honour to the congregation to which they ministered.

Scarborough has not yet found a successor to Mr. Thomas. Now that he has left Yorkshire I feel thankful that he was such a long way off; had he been a near neighbour I should have felt his loss as much as did many members of his flock. Malton loses Mr. Jenkinson at the close of the year; he has done well in maintaining the tradition of respectability and good work attaching to our tiny chapel there. Selby owes to Mr. Gardiner its recovery from the lowest state to which it had ever fallen; he has done his best under conditions of much difficulty and discouragement, and leaves the church in better condition than he found it. We are happy in having found a successor to him in the Rev. John Dale, of Bury St. Edmund's, who will come into residence with the New Year.

So much for our losses and difficulties. On the other side we have surmounted grievous difficulties and repaired the sorest losses at York and Huddersfield. Mr. Rawlings and Mr. Mellor are doing all that can be done at either place, and have, I believe, united and appreciative congregations. The church at Bradford maintains the high position which it has won under the present ministry; they have had many ministers there distinguished among us for their zeal and abilities, but I have heard of none who succeeded so well and held the post so long and did so much to heal differences as Mr. Jones has done.

At Halifax work goes on in enviable tranquillity; never breath reaches us of dissension or failure there. In his long ministry Mr. Millson has gathered round him a band of devoted and untiring workers, and our only regret is that the state of his health prevents him from taking any active part in the general concerns of our Union. If all our churches had as uneventful a record of quiet and steady good work and uninterrupted ministry, I might make my report by telegraph instead of filling three or four columns. It would be enough to say "All goes on as usual, nothing to complain of or regret."

Guilds, which Mr. Millson urged upon us twenty years ago, are at length taking root in our churches, and we have very much to hope from them. To me it seems that the question of our fate in the next century, whether we shall go on just existing or shall flourish and do good work in the world, depends upon the success or failure of this movement to unite our young people in the religious life. Our chapels are "places of worship": if we lose the spirit of worship, we have no business in them; if we retain and revive it we need have no fear for the future.

Our Union committee will meet before long to consider what we can do in the way of "a forward movement." We must be bold and cautious. Failure does not mean merely so much money and effort wasted; it means general discouragement, and as a result a natural unwillingness on the part of our laity to subscribe or assist in future. It is wisdom to dread it, and proceed very warily; but if our churches are really united there need be no failure. Will it be possible to get the twenty-five congregations all alike interested—small and greater working harmoniously together? If so, we may do much.

Such, my good reader of the year 2000, is the result of a brief glance over this big county to-day. There were much more to say if space allowed, but some things must not be said, and some need not. We are doing fairly well. I believe as well as ever we did. We are hoping great things of the next century—the century of your birth. You will know whether we were disappointed, and, perhaps, know more than we do why it was we failed.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth.—Special services were held in the Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday last. The Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., of Bolton, preached in the afternoon, and the Rev. M. R. Scott in the evening. The Mayor and Mayoress of Bury, Councillor and Mrs. Thomas Holt, attended the evening service, the Mayor wearing his chain of office. Councillor Holt is a member of the Ainsworth congregation, and has been one of the trustees for nearly twelve years. There was a large congregation in the evening. A collection was made on behalf of the B. and F. U. Association.

Bootle.—On Sunday week the Rev. J. Morley Mills preached in the Free Church a sermon, which is fully reported in a local paper, on "From Paganism to Christianity," illustrated by limelight views. Mr. Mills described primitive times in this country, the religion of the Druids and the coming of the Romans, and then told of the early preaching of Christianity. On Tuesday week a lecture was given by Mr. R. F. Lister to the Literary Society, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes in the chair, and on the following Thursday a social evening was held, when, in addition to musical items, the members of the dramatic club gave a sketch.

Boston.—The first social evening in connection with the Sewing Circle was held in the Unitarian Schoolroom on Wednesday week, about fifty of the members and friends being present. The service on Sunday evening was taken by Mr. Pratt, of London.

Brighton.—On Wednesday, Nov. 14, at the Free Christian Church, a "Longfellow Evening" was held, under the presidency of the Rev. H. M. Livens, following a paper on Longfellow, read by Mr. Livens at a previous meeting on Oct. 10. On Oct. 25 the five-hundredth anniversary of Chaucer's death was celebrated by a lecture, also by Mr. Livens on the "Canterbury Tales," with illustrative readings.

Colyton (Resignation).—Owing to the continued ill-health of his wife, the Rev. Alfred Sutcliffe, B.A., has felt compelled to resign the pulpit of George's Chapel. The resignation has been received with the utmost regret.

Guildford.—The new Mayor is Mr. George Tayler, J.P., one of the oldest and most loyal members of the Ward-street congregation. On Monday week, at a meeting of the Literary and Debating Society, a lecture was given by Dr. A. W. Stansfield, of Reading, on "The Philosophy of Punishment." Before the business of the meeting began, Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., C.C., moved a vote of congratulation to the Mayor, who is also President of the Society, on his election for the second time to the chief magistracy of the town. Mr. Ellis dwelt upon the spirit of self-sacrifice which Mr. Tayler carried into public life, and said how much the town owed to one whose devotion was so sincere and deep as it was true. The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, in seconding the vote, whilst speaking of the fact that congratulation should be paid rather to Guildford than to Mr. Tayler, who had accepted the onerous and arduous position of its chief magistracy, held that the acceptance of such offices by men of Mr. Tayler's honour, standing, and ability raised the general tone of municipal life within our Empire. The Mayor appropriately acknowledged the compliment, and then called upon Dr. Stansfield to deliver his address, which was throughout learned, literary, earnest, and convincing. The lecturer was cordially thanked, on the proposition of Mr. E. Ellis.

Hull.—On the 14th inst. the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., delivered a much-appreciated lecture on the subject of Scott's "Lady of the Lake" to the members of the Workers' League. The pulpit on Sunday last was occupied morning and evening by the Rev. W. Lyddon Tucker, M.A., of Hyde.

London: Deptford.—The ninth anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. A. J. Marchant at this place of worship was celebrated on Wednesday, 14th inst. Tea and coffee having been served, a public meeting was held, under the presidency of the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church, supported by the Revs. Joseph Freeston, T. E. M. Edwards, S. Burrows, Harold Rylett, W. H. Smith; Messrs. T. P. Young, G. Callow, and Councillor J. G. King, hon. sec. In response to the kind congratulatory remarks of the speakers, Mr. Marchant expressed his sincere thanks, and intimated that the London District Unitarian Society had recommended the payment from the Bazaar Fund of the remaining debt of £10 on account of the restoration of the building. The speeches were exceedingly interesting and the gathering an enjoyable one. It should also be mentioned that Mr. Young very generously presented several volumes of "The Sunday School Helper" for the use of the Sunday-school teachers.

London: Plumstead.—A successful "Social" was held in the Unitarian Church on Thursday evening, the 15th inst., when there was a splendid muster of the members and their friends. A feature of the evening was the presentation of a purse of money to the treasurer, Mr. Charles Harris, in recognition of his long and faithful service in the cause of Unitarianism since its revival in this neighbourhood. The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, in making the presentation on behalf of the congregation, referred to the ever-hopeful and cheery disposition of Mr. Harris, whom no difficulties could depress, and who, through evil report and good report, looked ever upward and forward, nor allowed himself to be discouraged by the many obstacles in the way—the prejudices, the divisions, and the doubts which were inevitable, and which only seemed to spur him on to greater effort. It gave him (Mr. Jones) the keenest pleasure to make this presentation, and on behalf of the church and congregation he hoped that Mr. Harris would long remain in their midst, a source of inspiration and a very model of confidence in the cause which they all loved. A characteristically modest reply from Mr. Harris closed this very pleasing incident. A charming programme of vocal and instrumental music, followed by dancing, completed the enjoyment of the evening.

London Sunday School Society.—At the annual social meeting of teachers and elder scholars, held at Essex Hall on Saturday last, there was a goodly gathering of over 200, comprising representatives from most of our London schools. The chair was taken shortly after 7 P.M. by the President (the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie), who, after the opening hymn, gave a short but inspiring address, in which he dwelt on the privilege of being dwellers in the mightiest city in the world, whose immensity it was well-nigh impossible to grasp, and appealed to the young people present to endeavour as they grew up to realise the full meaning of their citizenship, and to take an intelligent interest and share in the affairs, municipal and other, of their respective districts. A capital programme of music followed, to which the string quartette from Wandsworth contributed selections from "Mozart." A most attractive item in the programme was the very creditable rendering of some humorous dialogues, entitled The Trial of Ignorance; or, The Boy who would not Learn, by some of the elder scholars from Essex Church. During the evening reference was made to the sad bereavement sustained by Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, who, with her daughters, rarely if ever fails to be present at these social gatherings, and for whom a deep feeling of sympathy was expressed. A hearty vote of thanks to all the friends who had so kindly helped to make the meeting a success, proposed by Miss Marian Pritchard, and seconded by the Rev. F. Summers, was carried by acclamation.

Lynn.—A gathering of members and friends took place in this church on Wednesday week in connection with the visit to Lynn of the Executive Committee of the Eastern Union. The Executive held their business meeting in the afternoon, and were afterwards entertained to tea in the school by the members of the church. At the evening meeting Mr. G. Gemmell occupied the chair and welcomed the Executive to Lynn. The speakers included the Revs. Alfred Hall, M.A. (Norwich), C. D. Badland, M.A. (Yarmouth); Messrs. Sothern and Blazeby (treasurer), representing the Executive, and the Rev. A. Lunn, a former minister of Lynn, who has been conducting the services for the past three Sundays. The meeting was a very enthusiastic one, and concluded with a vote of thanks to the visitors.

Malton.—The harvest festival was held on Sunday and Monday week, a sacred concert being given on the Sunday afternoon by the Malton Orchestral Band and other friends. The preacher in the evening was the Rev. S. Jenkinson. On the Monday evening the Rev. E. W. Lummis gave his lecture on "Chaucer," preceded by a public tea, and followed by a supper.

Monton.—The Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., was welcomed as minister of Monton Church last Saturday, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal and a Congregational minister, the Rev. J. R. Bailey, taking part in the proceedings.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Since the return of the Rev. Frank Walters last May, he has been able, without intermission, to continue his duties, and now his health is so far restored that there seems to be every prospect of his full co-operation in Unitarian work in the district during the coming winter. At a special meeting of the congregation last Sunday, the following resolution, proposed by Mr. G. G.

Laidler, seconded by Alderman J. Barker Ellis, and supported by Councillor Robert Affleck, Alderman Joseph Baxter Ellis, and others, was unanimously passed :—"That this meeting of the Church of the Divine Unity offers to the Rev. Frank Walters its respectful wishes for his continued improvement in health, and assures him of the congregation's affectionate regard and confidence, and sincerely trusts that the future may bring him peace and fresh vigour to work in the church where he has laboured so many years."—(Signed) JOHN TWEEDY, Chairman ; OTTO LEVIN, Secretary.

North-East Lancs. Sunday School Union.—On Nov. 10 the annual meeting was held at Burnley. The proceedings commenced at 3 P.M., when a drawing-room entertainment, consisting of vocal and instrumental music was given. Tea was served at 4.30, and the meeting opened at 6.0, Mr. Nicholas Ingham (Padiham), the retiring president, in the chair. The annual report, giving account of satisfactory work during the year, was taken as read. The Rev. Arthur W. Fox, M.A. (of Todmorden), was elected president, Mr. J. S. Mackie (Burnley), treasurer, and Mr. A. Webster (Accrington), secretary. Mr. George H. Leigh and Mr. Fred Clayton were the delegates present, representing the Manchester District Sunday School Association and the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union respectively, and gave addresses. Mr. Leigh spoke of the work of his Association, and made an appeal for more help toward the Twentieth Century Fund, which is being raised to improve the Holiday Home and for other purposes. Mr. Clayton made a strong and earnest appeal to Sunday-school teachers, urging them to be sincere, to be punctual, and to prepare their lessons. He advocated the general use of the Bible, and also spoke in favour of Unitarianism being taught to our scholars. Hearty votes of thanks were passed, and a good meeting was closed with hymn and benediction.

Rochdale.—Mrs. Carter, wife of the Rev. T. Carter, formerly minister at Blackwater-street, in addition to the office of Guardian of the Poor, which she has held for several years, has been elected a member of the School Board. Mr. Luther Jackson, it is also reported, has promised to build a vestry for the church, to commemorate the election of Mr. Alderman Topper as the first Unitarian Mayor of Rochdale.

Rotherham.—On Tuesday week a lecture was given by the Rev. E. W. Lummis on "Chaucer," under the auspices of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union. Mr. Lummis gave a vivid picture of Chaucer's England, and recited passages from "The Canterbury Tales" with great acceptance.

Stockport.—The Stockport Unitarian Dramatic Society gave a very successful presentation of the famous comedy, Still Waters Run Deep, on Thursday, 8th inst. The proceeds were in aid of the School Auxiliary Fund. There was a large audience, which followed with deep interest the unfolding of the plot of this fine play.

Wakefield.—The annual school sermons were preached at Westgate Chapel on Sunday last by the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., of York. At both services he dealt with interesting aspects of the education and training of the young, and the congregations were large and the collections extremely satisfactory. On the following evening the annual congregational soirée was held in the school, when about 150 people partook of a substantial tea. The subsequent meeting, presided over by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, was held in the girls' schoolroom, which was decorated for the occasion. In his opening remarks the Chairman said that Westgate Chapel had gone on during the past year much in its accustomed way. There were some sad losses by death to deplore, and on the other hand new homes had been founded by those who had grown up in their midst, and several intelligent and earnest people had become adherents, so that there was no cause for discouragement. Their finances were well watched over, their buildings in good condition, their choir efficient, and their activities fairly prosperous. A vote of thanks to Mr. Rawlings, the special preacher, having been passed and acknowledged, a very enjoyable programme of high-class music and excellent addresses followed, the speakers being the Revs. Charles Hargrove, C. Harvey-Cook, and E. Ceredig Jones. The secretary of the Sunday-school, Mr. P. F. Booth, also gave an informal report of the school, the library, and other connected institutions. Through epidemics and various other causes the number of scholars had somewhat diminished, but efforts were now being made to bring matters up to the highest possible standard. After votes of thanks, Mr. Chalmers closed the meeting by expressing the hope that all would be spared to enter on the new century six weeks hence, with hope and faith and courage, and he trusted it would bring with it happiness, prosperity, and peace.

CHORLEY CHAPEL, LANCASHIRE (UNITARIAN).

We earnestly APPEAL to your readers for help on behalf of the Renovation of the above Chapel, which, through decay, consequent upon old age, is unfit for worship. It is the oldest Nonconformist Chapel in the town, having been built in 1724.

Since the choice of the Rev. Andrew Doel as Minister, the congregations have increased, and deeper interest has been shown by the people in the cause. But the present state of the Chapel hinders greater progress. £700 is necessary for the renovation. Towards this amount the congregation, though poor, have raised £300, and we have received a few responses from circulars; but we are dependent upon help from outside friends.

Contributions will be gratefully received by the Rev. A. DOEL, The Manse, Chorley; Messrs. W. H. SUTCLIFFE, Hanover-street; W. M. GILLIBRAND, 51, Market-street; W. PORTER, Cross Hall.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE last month of the year which will close the nineteenth century must bring with it many crowding thoughts of retrospect and anticipation. Would that it were possible during the next few weeks to silence all the clamour of the world, that in an interval of solemn quietness we might make some reckoning with ourselves, as to what we have gained in the past, what its lessons and its memories must mean to us, and in what spirit we must enter upon the coming time! But while we cannot call such a truce, we can secure some quiet times for that "recollection" of ourselves and a girding up of our strength for better service. To that end we trust that THE INQUIRER may be able to give some help during the remaining weeks of the present year.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE, though still progressing well as announced last week, was not sufficiently recovered to lecture at University College on Thursday. His doctor is of the opinion, however, that if the present state of progress is maintained he will certainly be able to lecture next Thursday, and thus will be able to complete his course of five lectures before Christmas.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the First Unitarian Church on the Pacific Coast, that of San Francisco, was celebrated on Oct. 21. We are grateful to the Pacific Unitarian for a full and stimulating report of the celebration. The anniversary was kept in other churches along the coast, but the chief observance was naturally in the First Church itself. One venerable member, the sole survivor of those who founded the church, was present, and a letter of greeting was received from the Rev. Horatio Stebbins, for more than thirty years their minister and now living in retirement at Cambridge, Mass. An historical address was given by Mr. Horace Davis, telling of the early efforts of the church, the brilliant services of Starr King (not to the church alone, but as a patriot, in the hour of crisis, to his country) minister from 1860 until his early death in 1864, the long and fruitful ministry of Dr. Stebbins, and the settlement of the Rev. Bradford Leavitt, the present minister. Other addresses followed, recording the many activities of the church, and full of faith and hope for the future. In California and the States of Washington and Oregon there are now twenty-one Unitarian churches in all.

THE Spectator, in a recent review of Mr. Jackson's "James Martineau; a Biography and a Study," while acknowledging the good points of the book, warned its readers that they would not find in it "an adequate picture of one of the most striking personalities of our time." The writer of this notice is evidently one who had personal knowledge of Dr. Martineau and a clear discernment of his greatness. The following sentences contain some of the happiest touches of portraiture with which we have met :—

Those who had the honour of knowing Dr. Martineau were impressed by two things—first, the absolute domination of the spiritual over the carnal in his nature; secondly, the immense weight of learning so easily borne, suggestive of a life in which not one minute had ever been wasted. Browning might have written his "Rabbi ben Ezra" with Martineau in his mind. The spare tenement of clay was for nearly ninety-five years the swift, obedient servant of the regnant soul. The eager mind drew in nourishment from every source of learning and culture. Mr. Jackson's biography, slight though it is, brings out these predominant aspects of Dr. Martineau's nature. Indeed, there is much clear insight as well as invariable good taste in what Mr. Jackson has to say. We agree with him too that the French element in Martineau's mind must never be overlooked. That element, says our author, proclaims the nationality which produced Bossuet—and, we should add, Pascal.

Of Dr. Martineau's style the writer says :—

If at times it is too complex and brilliant, too much polished and refined, yet it is the outcome of the man, and it will perhaps rank with the styles of De Quincey, Arnold, Newman, and Ruskin as the finest English of our century. To our mind, this fine style reaches its height in some of the sermons; rarely, if ever, has the noblest spiritual thought found more apt, more chastened expression.

And the article concludes with the following reference to Dr. Martineau's position as a philosopher :—

With the neo-Kantian movement which has mainly captured England and Scotland during the last generation Dr. Martineau was in imperfect sympathy. He held so firmly in ethics by intuition, in psychology by free will, in metaphysics by divine personality, that it was impossible he should adopt a different attitude. We cannot classify him in any school; he is a solitary, majestic pillar in the temple of English thought.

One mistake in this review we note, where in sketching Martineau's career it is said that from Dr. Lant Carpenter's school at Bristol "he repaired to Glasgow University." From Bristol Martineau went to Derby to enter on his apprenticeship as an engineer, and on relinquishing that career, proceeded to Manchester College, then at York, where his whole course as a student for the ministry was completed. He was never a student at Glasgow. This correction was made by Mr. Basil Martineau in a letter in last week's Spectator.

THE death of Sir Arthur Sullivan, on Nov. 22, takes from us a musician brilliant and popular beyond all others in this country, and it was in accordance with the general feeling that he was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. His more serious music, notably The Golden Legend and the Irish symphony, was of such a quality as to lead some to regret that he did not devote himself entirely to such work; but the Victorian age would have been the poorer for the lack of the inimitable Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Sullivan will long be remembered also as the author not only of some very popular songs, such as "The Lost Chord," but of a number of fine hymn tunes, of which "St. Gertrude," the popular tune for "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and "Forward be our Watchword," is the best known.

WE regret to learn from the Indian Mirror, of Nov. 7, of the death on the previous Saturday of a rising poetess and lady journalist, Srimati Banalata Debi, the editor of the Ladies' Journal Antahpore, and the gifted daughter of the well-known social reformer Babu Sasipada Banerji. Of this lady, who was only twenty-one years of age, the Indian Mirror says :—

From her girlhood Banalata Debi was trained up by her father for his great work, and she imbibed all his instincts for philanthropic work. Even while she was at school, she used to help teachers in their work, and immediately after leaving it she started an Association at Baranagore for ladies called Sumati Samiti. Though she was born in the Brahmo Samaj, her work was mainly carried on amongst Hindu ladies. This Association is principally backed by Hindu ladies who are its members. Gradually she started at her father's suggestIon a journal conducted purely by ladies and her Antahpore has now found its place in almost every Hindu home. Her contributions, both in verse and prose, to the columns of Antahpore, and other Bengali journals will be remembered as long as the Bengali literature lasts.

WE published last week Mr. Cuckson's note from Boston, Mass., as to the return of the Rev. John McDowell to this country. We now hear that Mr. McDowell arrived at Liverpool on Thursday, the 22nd inst., the Dominion-liner, the Commonwealth, having made a good voyage in very favourable weather. His address is—4, Denstone-road, Pendleton, Manchester.

WE are sorry to find that more than one of our correspondents, for whose judgment we have a high regard, have taken Mr. Jacks's jeu d'esprit of last week on "Mansfield Workhouse and Essex Hall" quite seriously. If we had thought that possible, we should have resisted our inclination to allow a little good-natured banter at the close of a serious correspondence. We should have been glad if Mr. Fripp had cared to make some response, but we cannot publish any other letters on the subject.

"AS OTHERS SEE US."

(AT SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.)

AT the recent School Board election in Birmingham a dead set was made against the Liberal Education Eight on the ground that three of their number were Unitarians. The programme of the eight included the reading and repetition of suitable passages of Scripture, the singing of a hymn, and the use of the Lord's Prayer. But this did not satisfy the Church party, and they ridiculed it as only a "dose of Unitarianism." Such an experience must give us pause, in our eagerness to rejoice over the growing toleration of our age and the growth of Liberal principles. In quarters not a few, the old bad ecclesiastical bigotries still survive, and on occasion flare up with quite the old fury. Here, for instance, is an extract from the St. Matthew's Church Parish Magazine, Great Lister-street, Birmingham, in which the vicar, the Rev. A. Pritchard, M.A., tells his parishioners what Unitarianism is and is not. The passage is so choice that we give it in full:—

YOU OUGHT TO KNOW

That Unitarianism, like many "isms" of the East, is a false Religion;

That it is the "black plague" of Christianity;

That it is a so-called Religion without Christ;

That Morality is its Saviour and not the Lord Jesus;

That this soul-destroying heresy has for generations held in its deadly clutches the intellectually-proud and well-to-do in Birmingham and neighbourhood, and

That, through them, it has for twenty-seven years been strangling the cause of True Religion and Sound Learning in the People's Schools.

PONDER THE SITUATION!

Christianity—the Religion of the Working Classes!

Unitarianism—the Refuge of the influential and well-to-do!

This is pretty well for an apostle of Sweetness and Light! The Roman Catholic candidate, however, was not to be beaten by his co-priest. He told his flock that the Liberal Education Eight having refused to allow the doctrine of the Trinity to be taught in the Board Schools stood "revealed in all their hideous deformity as a league for the suppression of Christianity!"—

What else could they expect from such a pandemonium of beliefs as they represented? There were among them three Unitarians, and, as they knew, Unitarians were not Christians. They were bent on effacing the Christianity of the land. Their only notion of religious freedom was like the Mahommedan one—freedom to choose the Koran or the sword!

When clerics exhibit themselves in such a paroxyism of intolerance, we may remind our friends that the time for laying aside our protest against all the claims and pretensions of the priest has not yet arrived.

THE SETH IBBETSON FUND.

THE Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, 43 Blenheim-road, Bradford, desires to acknowledge with sincere thanks the following contributions towards the above fund, in addition to the list of yearly subscriptions, amounting to £10 4s., which appeared in last Saturday's INQUIRER:—Yearly Subscriptions: Mr. William Rathbone, £2 2s. for five years (£10 10s.); Mrs. O. C., £1. Donations: Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, £10; Mr. J. P. Thomasson, £5; Mrs. Richard Oram, £2 2s.; Mrs. N., £5; Mrs. H. Currer Briggs, £2 2s.; Mr. H. W. Gair, 10s.; Mr. H. J. Morton, £1 1s.; Mr. C. G. Oates, £1.

Further contributions sent to the above address will be gratefully received and acknowledged in THE INQUIRER.

THE FIRST UNITARIAN MAYOR OF ROCHDALE.

SIR,—It gave me a sad sense of public forgetfulness when I read in THE INQUIRER what I had seen with less surprise in The Christian World that Mr. Alderman Topper is "the first Unitarian Mayor of Rochdale."

When I went to be minister of Blackwater-street Chapel in the early part of 1859, one of the chief men of the town was my esteemed friend Mr. Robert Taylor Heape. I understood that Mr. Heape had just lately served the office of Mayor, the borough having been incorporated in 1856, and Mr. Heape being not only "the first Unitarian Mayor of Rochdale," but its first Mayor. He was the life and strength of the Unitarian congregation in those days, was one of the most delightful and most generous of men, and I have always felt for him, and feel now for his memory, a most affectionate regard. In my day Blackwater-street Chapel sadly needed a vestry, and I am glad to learn that as that beautiful building owed its erection to my much esteemed friend, who was really "the first Unitarian Mayor of Rochdale," so it may owe its completion to Mr. Luther Jackson's laudable wish to commemorate the reign of "the first Unitarian Mayor" of a second generation. But do not let us forget the forefathers of whom we have so much reason to be proud.

P. W. CLAYDEN.

1, Upper Woburn-place, Nov. 24.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, informs us that Mr. Jacob Bright was the first mayor, and Mr. Heape the second, having served twice, 1857-8 and 1876-7. Also that Mr. T. W. Shawcross was another Unitarian mayor.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.

SIR,—At the request and on behalf of Brhmoa Somaj Committee, I have much pleasure in conveying to you their most cordial thanks for the help you have been good enough to render towards the raising of the Fund for the relief of the sufferers from famine in India, by your kind insertion of all acknowledgments and letters on the subject, and by the notes which have appeared from time to time in THE INQUIRER on behalf of the Fund.

Permit me to add that the kindness of our Unitarian friends who have started and generously subscribed to the Fund, and their practical sympathy in the present dark hour of India's need and on previous occasions, will not be forgotten. This is the work of that true Imperialism which helps to bring England and India nearer together; and furnishes basis for the earnest hope that in the dawning century, love and justice and righteousness will unite more truly and more intimately the people of these two lands in the worship of a common Father, and allegiance to a common Sovereign. And in working that ideal and realising that hope, no small share, perhaps, will be assigned by Providence to the Brahmo Somaj in India and our loving brethren of the Unitarian community in England.

A report of the work will be sent by our secretary as soon as the reports from certain centres here are received and the accounts closed. Thanking you again, and thanking the generous subscribers to the Fund, Mr. Ion Pritchard who, as Chairman of the Indian Committee, has worked so earnestly and so indefatigably to raise the Fund, and the Rev. Mr. Sunderland, whose letter in your columns first drew the special attention of our Unitarian friends to the subject, and whom and whose successor in the Unitarian Mission we remember with such loving esteem in India.

A. M. BOSE.

Calcutta, Nov. 8.

MEN living in circumstances which seem to imprison them and give them no opportunity of escape, men living in drudgery and poverty, seeming to have nothing to do but to earn their bread and water from day to day; again and again these men have found themselves, if they trusted in God and lifted their eyes above their circumstances up to Him, have found their lives growing wise with a wisdom that has come to them in the midst of the poor things by which they were surrounded. They have found their souls at liberty, even in the midst of dungeons, and so have walked in spiritual pastures wide, and climbed mountain heights, while lingering in cells where they could scarcely stand upright. And so they have served their brethren as they went on their pilgrimage of pain.—Phillips Brooks.

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

VIII.

THE BAPTISTS.

WHEN the nineteenth century began Baptists were divided into three main bodies; these were the General Baptists, the Particular Baptists, and the then recent New Connexion of General Baptists. Doctrinally these divisions represented (1) Arminianism combined generally with Unitarianism, (2) Calvinism, (3) Arminianism which disclaimed Unitarianism. Such was the Baptist body when the century began. Before it had ended an event occurred which merged divisions (2) and (3). At Manchester in the autumn of 1892 the Particular Baptist denomination was joined in wedlock with the New Connexion of General Baptists.

Shall it be said that Calvinism and Arminianism kissed each other? Hardly, for during the century Calvinism had so diminished as to have almost become extinct in the important body which somewhat to its embarrassment still retained the Particular in its title. Now by the union celebrated in the last decade of this century the word Particular has retired from present day Baptist nomenclature, and General is confined to a few Unitarian churches. But it is the larger body, the Particular Baptist, that has yielded, or rather has registered by this union a gradual but very evident surrender. There has been no narrowing of the General, but there has been a decided widening of the Particular. In fact, Calvinism has been relegated to the obscure Hyper-Calvinistic churches.

It had long ceased to dominate the larger branch of the Baptist body, though a century ago it seemed firmly intrenched there. In 1800 it was distinct enough to drive from the communion a promising young student not unknown in Unitarian annals, named Robert Aspland. A student at Aberdeen on the Ward Foundation, "he supposed himself not qualified to enjoy the benefits of the Ward Trust, which had been granted to him as a Calvinistic believer, and he hastened to replace in the hands of the Trustees the bursary which they had voted for his use."* Though in the following year young Aspland was ordained as the minister of the General Baptist (Unitarian) congregation of Newport, in the Isle of Wight, he at first regarded his resignation of the bursary as a renunciation of a ministerial career, and that he should thus have relinquished his most cherished hopes, shows that the Particular in the Particular Baptist denomination was then anything but a dead letter. Indeed at this period Calvinism had for a time revived, and the Latitudinarianism of an earlier period, illluminated by the genius of Robert Robinson, was discountenanced. The strong reaction to Conservatism which followed the excesses of the French Revolution had not then spent its force, and acted upon theology as well as politics. Robert Hall, the greatest intellectual influence amongst the Particular Baptists at that time, had become distinctly less liberal. Addington was said to be his favourite minister—Addington whose term of office as Premier was due to a King's bigotry. The Robert Hall who had been the vindicator of the liberty of the Press, and had exulted in the French Revolution, was twitted by a smart writer in the Monthly Repository for 1812 as "an emeritus professor of the rights of man and the prerogatives of conscience." A man of inferior genius, but perhaps of stronger sense, the Rev. Andrew Fuller, of Kettering, was also a leader, according to some even a dictator of the denomination who did much to shape its theology. But the task was no easy one, even for a time, for the native air of Baptists is freedom. Born or re-born in a revolt of the human mind against every convention—a revolt which in parts of Germany and Holland in the sixteenth century shook the civilised world by its frantic fury—Baptists have never taken kindly to despotism. Rarely, indeed, has their orthodoxy been beyond reproach. Unitarianism with them was arrived at by no gradual progress through Calvinism, Arminianism and Arianism as with the English Presbyterians. They were imbued with it from the beginning.

Baptist Confessions.

Those who prefer not to believe this, point to the various Baptist confessions published in England since the first in 1644; but none of these were of binding authority on any save the few who set their names to them. Moreover, the object of these creeds was so evidently to conciliate orthodox opinion that we cannot be surprised that they were made as orthodox as possible. But even this inducement failed to make the London Confession of 1660 a satisfactory Trinitarian document. Any Arian could have signed it. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that a large portion of the Baptist body was Conservative in its theology and anxious to be dissociated from tenets which it regarded as heterodox. Absorbing the Calvinism which was the orthodoxy of the time this body made the Particular Baptists. The General Baptists from the first included the more liberal and adventurous spirits. Mosheim, though his description as a whole is not accurate, truly described them in the words—"Their religion is very general and indefinite, so that they tolerate persons of all sects, even Arians and Socinians, and do not reject any person, provided he professes to be a Christian and to receive the Holy Scriptures as the rule of religious faith and practice."* This latitude of belief was not curtailed during the Latitudinarian eighteenth century. It was rather accentuated, and unfortunately was accompanied by a decline in zeal which proved fatal to many a once prosperous Church.

Evangelical Revival.

When, largely owing to the great Methodist revival, the missionary spirit revived, it was accompanied by a more rigid theology, and partly as a protest against this Latitudinarianism the New Connexion of General Baptists was formed. Some of the old General Baptist churches were absorbed by it, and its fresh missionary zeal soon succeeded in founding others. A writer in the Monthly Repository for 1808 thus describes the two parties:—

The General Baptists have of late been gradually forming the parties. The old denomination lean towards heresy, the new (with the exception of the articles of baptism and general redemption) are attached to orthodoxy. The former are found chiefly in the south, the latter in the midland part of England. It would be difficult to estimate their respective strength, but both parties united would scarcely form a sect of the fourth or fifth order.

A writer so near the facts of which he is writing might have been somewhat more accurate. If he had consulted the published minutes of the New Connexion (hardly so rare then as now) he would have found very detailed statistics of that body, which, instead of being then only gradually formed, had been for more than twenty years a compact organisation, distinct from the Particular Baptists or Calvinistic Baptists, on the one hand, and from the old General Baptists, chiefly Unitarian, on the other. Referring to the minutes I find that at the Association held at Loughborough on July 1, 2, and 3, 1801, the number of members was reported to be 3,594, an increase of nearly 200 on the preceding year's return. It would not be easy to estimate with accuracy the number of the old General Baptists at this period, but I do not think it would exceed this. I have reason to think that the two denominations were nearly equal in number when the century began, but the contrast of their growth through that century is very instructive. Well organised, active, full of the missionary spirit, the New Connexion grew rapidly. In 1820 it had more than doubled the number of 1801, and in 1890, two years before its union with the Particular Baptist body, could claim a membership of 26,782.

General Baptist Decline.

Compared with this the record of the older body is poor indeed. It is doubtful whether it has made a single advance, and in number and influence is much less considerable than it was when the century began. A partial explanation of this contrast might be found in the geographical distribution of the two bodies, the one chiefly in the active Midlands, the other in the more sleepy South. It might also be urged that the views of the more heterodox body were less acceptable to the popular mind, but without altogether ignoring these excuses, the truer explanation lies deeper: it is to be found in the missionary enthusiasm of the one denomination and the apathy of the other. The New Connexion soon began to look abroad, and moved by no petty parochial spirit, founded a foreign mission, and boldly sent its representatives to the millions in Orissa. Shortly after the foundation of the Foreign Mission Society in 1816, the "Itinerant Fund" was formed into a "Home Missionary Society," and these two organisations called out and developed the self-sacrifice and zeal of the whole Connexion.

While the older body was miserably declining, the watchword of the New Connexion was Forward. To dare, and again to dare, and always to dare was the policy which made the blood in old veins tingle, and captured the hearts of the young. Did not even the little Sunday-school children feel it when at their crowded anniversary services they sang their militant hymns? What though their accent was quaintly provincial, their hearts were warm and true.

The Baptist Union.

As the century advanced, and the Calvinism of the Particular Baptists

* "Memoir of the Rev. R. Aspland," p. 96.

* "Mosheim's Institutes," Reid's edition, p. 696.

steadily decreased, the Particular Baptists and the New Connexion General Baptists began to draw together. Ministerial exchanges became more frequent. Students trained at Stepney and Regent's Park, Particular Baptist Colleges, accepted the charge of General Baptist congregations, and Particular Baptist churches felt no hesitation in inviting men who hailed from Leicester and Chilwell. This growing affinity was immensely accelerated by the formation of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland in 1882, and ten years later the amalgamation took place.

Amongst the most remarkable theological phenomena of this century of Baptist life are the decay of Calvinism and the vitality of the Evangelical spirit. It was this spirit which triumphed over the Calvinism of the Particular Baptists, and made a dead letter of its gloomy tenets, and it was this spirit which filled the New Connection with abounding life and energy. The rite of baptism as observed amongst the Baptists is also obviously an important factor in their life and growth. Its inconvenience, and the drawbacks to it which timidity and half-heartedness might urge, make it the more valuable as a pledge of loyalty to the Master. The impressive words "On a profession of thy faith I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," the plunge into the water, the resurrection from that mystic tomb, while voices raise a loud "Praise ye the Lord" and "Halleluiah," make an impression which is rarely effaced.

The Baptist's Motive Power.

Devotion to Jesus Christ, as the Saviour of the world, has been the motive power of Baptist religion. Controversy there has been; but until the Downgrade Controversy, originated by the late Mr. Spurgeon, it had not greatly affected the churches. Before this its chief subjects were the limit of salvation, the duration of future punishment, and the more immediately practical question of open or close communion. Dr. Samuel Cox, the well-known editor of the Expositor and author of "Salvator Mundi," was a General Baptist, and his views on the subject of future punishment, published before Dean Farrar's more widely known work appeared, have had much influence in the denomination of which he was a distinguished member. It may, indeed, be said that on all these subjects the more liberal view has generally triumphed in both sections of the denomination, a fact which Mr. Spurgeon recognised, deplored, and to the extent of his power resisted. What effect the amalgamation will have upon this growing liberality time alone can show; but there will doubtless be opposition. The leaven of bitterness caused by the "Downgrade" Controversy—that "Greatest Fight in the World," as a dainty booklet called it—has not yet ceased to work, and may still cause friction for a time. But suspicion and bigotry will not long flourish in the free air which Baptists breathe. They are not likely for long to make any creed their gaoler. They know their Lowell too well for that.

New occasions teach new duties; Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth.
Lo! before us gleam her camp-fires! We ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the Future's portal with the Past's blood rusted key.

No Church has made a nobler stand for liberty than the Baptist. Her history is rich in martyrs, but she has never made martyrs. Successors of the men who dared to petition Cromwell for the release of Biddle, when the pack of Presbyterians and Independents was in full cry for the heretic's condemnation, would act a strange part as heresy hunters in the twentieth century, even though a second Spurgeon urged them on. Rather let us hope, as with augmented resources, and an economy of organisation, the United Baptist host meets the New Century, every soldier in the ranks will Gain in life as life advances,

Valour and charity more and more.

And what of the remnant which now has exclusive possession of the name General Baptist?—"And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest."

LITERATURE.

THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.*

MR. LEONARD HUXLEY has admirably fulfilled the purpose with which he undertook to write the life of his father, which was to give a picture of the man himself, "of his aims in the many struggles in which he was engaged, of his character and temperament, and the circumstances under which his various works were begun and completed." Of the life he has thus to picture, the son speaks further in the preface, describing the impression Huxley made on his contemporaries:—

They were chiefly moved by something over and above his wide knowledge in so many fields—by his passionate sincerity, his interest not only in pure knowledge, but in human life, by his belief that the interpretation of the book of nature was not to be kept apart from the ultimate problems of existence; by the love of truth, in short, both theoretical and practical, which gave the key to the character of the man himself.

In two large volumes, making, with appendices and a capital index, over a thousand pages, the picture is drawn, and delightfully drawn, chiefly through the printing of Huxley's own letters. One is glad to be enabled thus to linger over a life so rich in many interests, and through his intimate correspondence, even at times quite trivial notes, to be brought close to one of the most human of men, to know him not only as a keen thinker, a great worker, an indomitable fighter, but as a staunch friend, unselfish and of the most sensitive honour, affectionate and often overflowing with humour and merriment, carrying through life the burden of uncertain health, yet never embittered, a man essentially reverent and of a steadfast courage.

Huxley holds a chief place in the history of English thought during the last fifty years, and these volumes will furnish a commentary of the utmost value on his published works, since nothing is written which is not better understood, if one knows the writer. Born in 1825, at Ealing, where his father was assistant master at a semi-public school, Huxley received a medical training at Charing-cross Hospital, and having entered the naval service sailed in December, 1846, as assistant surgeon on the Rattlesnake, a frigate with six-and-twenty guns commanded by a brother of Dean Stanley's, on a four years' exploring cruise, for the greater part of the time off the coast of Australia and New Guinea. At Sydney he found his future wife, but it was eight years before they could be married. Returning to England at the close of 1850, Huxley had a severe struggle for the next four years to make his way as a man of science, and to gain a position in which he would be able to devote himself to his chosen subjects. His appointment as lecturer on Natural History in the Government School of Mines, in 1854, marks the turn of the tide, followed shortly after by his appointment as Naturalist on the Geographical Survey. From that time his career was one of unbroken prosperity and growing influence, full of the stress of an eager intellectual life, of keen controversies and crowding public duties, crowned also with many honours, among which his appointment as Privy Councillor seems to have afforded him some innocent amusement as well as satisfaction.

Of Huxley's many correspondents the chief were naturally men of science, and through his letters to Darwin, Tyndall, Spencer, Hooker, Michael Foster, and others, one follows the course of those strenuous years from the publication in 1859 of Darwin's "Origin of Species," of which Huxley was from the first the most eager champion. We must not attempt here to give even the barest outline of the story. There are many vivid scenes, the most striking, perhaps, being that at the Oxford meeting of the British Association, in 1860, when the Bishop used his great powers of eloquence and ridicule to discredit the new theory of Darwin, and Huxley made his famous retort. Very different was the scene in 1893 when Huxley delivered his Romanes lecture at Oxford, having seven years before received the honorary Doctor's degree from the University; and again in 1894 at another meeting of the British Association at Oxford, when he had a great reception on rising to second the vote of thanks to Lord Salisbury for his presidential address. Huxley was President of the Association in 1870 at the Liverpool meeting. Later he also served as President of the Royal Society. In 1874 he was Lord Rector of Aberdeen University.

One of the most interesting episodes of Huxley's career was his election as a member of the first School Board for London. Though he only served for fourteen months and early in 1872 was compelled for reasons of health to retire, he exerted a potent influence for good in the first shaping of the Board's policy, in regard both to its own procedure and the character of the instruction to be given. His reason for supporting, as he did, the motion for Bible-reading in the schools is clearly stated in the following letter, written in 1879 to Mr. Edward Clodd, thanking him for a copy of his "Jesus of Nazareth."

It is the book I have been longing to see; in spirit, matter, and form it appears to me to be exactly what people like myself have been wanting. For though for the last quarter of a century I have done all that lay in my power to oppose and destroy the idolatrous accretions of Judaism and Christianity, I have never had the slightest sympathy with those who, as the Germans say, would "throw the child away along with the bath"—and when I was a member of the London School Board I fought for the retention of the Bible, to the great scandal of some of my Liberal friends—who can't make out to this day whether I was a hypocrite, or simply a fool on that occasion.

* "Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley," by his son, Leonard Huxley. 2 vols. Macmillan and Co. 30s. net.

But my meaning was that the mass of the people should not be deprived of the one great literature which is open to them—not shut out from the perception of their relations with the whole past history of civilised mankind—not excluded from such a view of Judaism and Jesus of Nazareth as that which at last you have given us.

Eleven years later Huxley wrote another letter, from which we must also quote. It is addressed to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, acknowledging the gift of the second edition of his book on "The First Three Gospels." To Sir Joseph Hooker, he wrote:—"Carpenter has written the best popular statement I know of, of the results of criticism, in a little book, called 'The First Three Gospels,' which is well worth reading." And to Mr. Carpenter himself he speaks of it as "an admirable exposition of the case, full, clear, and calm," and as a book that will "do yeoman's service to the cause of right reason." But then Huxley proceeds to explain his dissent from Mr. Carpenter's view of the personality of Jesus as the leading cause of the evolution of Christianity from Judaism. The letter is so interesting from more than one point of view that we quote the latter part of it in full:—

I long thought so, and having a strong dislike to belittle the heroic figures of history, I held by the notion as long as I could, but I find it melting away.

I cannot see that the moral and religious ideal of early Christianity is new—on the other hand, it seems to me to be implicitly and explicitly contained in the early prophetic Judaism, and the later Hellenised Judaism; and though it is quite true that the new vitality of the old ideal manifested in early Christianity demands "an adequate historic cause," I would suggest that the word "cause" may mislead if it is not carefully defined.

Medical philosophy draws a most useful and necessary distinction between "exciting" and "predisposing" causes—and nowhere is it more needful to keep this distinction in mind than in history—and especially in estimating the action of individuals on the cause of human affairs. Platonic and Stoical philosophy—prophetic liberalism—the strong democratic socialism of the Jewish political system—the existence of innumerable sodalities for religious and social purposes—had thrown the ancient world into a state of unstable equilibrium. With such predisposing causes at work, the exciting cause of enormous changes might be relatively insignificant. The powder was there—a child might throw the match which should blow up the whole concern.

I do not want to seem irreverent, still less depreciatory of noble men, but it strikes me that in the present case the Nazarenes were the match and Paul the child.

An ingrained habit of trying to explain the unknown by the known leads me to find the key of Nazarenism in Quakerism. It is impossible to read the early history of the Friends without seeing that George Fox was a person who exerted extraordinary influence over the men with whom he came in contact; and it is equally impossible (at least for me) to discover in his copious remains an original thought.

Yet what with the corruption of the Stuarts, the Phariseeism of the Puritans, and the Sadduceeism of the Church, England was in such a state, that before his death he had gathered about him a vast body of devoted followers, whose patient endurance of persecution is a marvel. Moreover, the Quakers have exercised a prodigious influence on later English life.

This parallel between the marvellous influence of Fox's preaching and that of Jesus is very suggestive, and must have occurred to many readers of Fox's "Journal," where there are narratives even of what appear to be miraculous acts of healing, illustrating in a striking manner the Gospel record. But in neither case, as it appears to us, does Huxley rightly appreciate the significance of a great personality in the teaching of religion and the quickening of new life. Grant that all the predisposing causes were as Huxley describes, and that in the Christian ideal there was nothing new, which could not be found in fragments and in one form or another elsewhere in the world, yet only such a one as Jesus could have gathered all that was best in the spiritual aspirations of mankind into one focus, and so by the ideal of his own life made real to men, have given it a new and conquering force. Paul doubtless was the chief instrument by whom the kindling life of the first disciples was cast into the midst of an expectant world, ready to be set aflame, but it was not an abstract idea, it was the passion of personal discipleship, finding therein the truth of a new spiritual life, which overcame the world. Huxley said in a letter to Romanes two years later: "I have a great respect for the Nazarenism of Jesus—very little for later 'Christianity.' But the only religion that appeals to me is prophetic Judaism." He does not appear to have appreciated at its full worth the inspiring force of the personality of Jesus, in whom, we should say, that prophetic Judaism found its most perfect utterance.

There are other aspects of Huxley's life on which we should have been glad to dwell, had space permitted. His agnosticism we have referred to in this week's leading article, but there is one other subject, involving a moral question of painful interest, which we must not pass over here.

Chapter 29 of the first volume deals with the controversy on the subject of Vivisection in the interests of science. Huxley and Darwin were both great lovers of animals, and of a sensitive nature which shrank instinctively from any act of cruelty, yet both defended the practice of vivisection as necessary for the progress of knowledge and the consequent alleviation of human suffering. Huxley, we are told, "never followed any line of research involving experiments on living and conscious animals," but he felt bound to defend the action of those who do "disagreeable work for the good of humanity," and he strongly insisted on the false logic of those who allow the infliction of pain connected with sport, but will not tolerate it in the cause of science. This last may be a salutary plea to enforce the need for greater humanity in the matter of sport, but it does not touch the real issue. Passing over all physiological experiments on living animals, rendered insensible to pain and destroyed before they recover consciousness, and even the use of animals under such conditions for purposes of demonstration to students, one is faced by the question whether it is permitted to man to subject helpless and highly sensitive animals to prolonged torture in the hope of advancing knowledge, and of thereby relieving a far greater amount of human suffering. We will not enter into the question of the utility of such a method of experiment, or of the results hitherto achieved at the cost of untold suffering to the victims; on these points expert opinion is sharply divided. But supposing great results in the alleviation of suffering to have been achieved or to be in sight, we cannot escape the conviction that they are bought at too heavy a price, and that a nobler manhood demands that we should refrain, and seek our fuller knowledge possibly by slower methods, yet untainted by that cruel wrong to creatures which are helpless in our hands.

One of the eight Royal Commissions on which Huxley served was that in 1876 on the practice of Vivisection. He felt it his duty, he said, "to act as counsel for Science," and wrote to Darwin in despair at the evidence of a foreign witness who confessed to utter callousness towards the suffering of animals, as having done "more mischief than all the fanatics put together." But while strongly resenting the attitude of "such an unmitigated cynical brute," Huxley could not be moved from his own position that humanity demanded the setting aside of natural sympathy in the pursuit of fuller knowledge. It is a judgment in which Huxley's high scientific authority fails to carry us with him, and which the highest interest of humanity, as it appears to us, must meet with absolute dissent.

But we cannot part from these fascinating volumes at such a point. Huxley's was a noble life, devoted to the service of truth. On the eve of 1857, planning out his work for the next few years, he wrote in his journal:—

To smite all humbugs, however big; to give a nobler tone to science; to set an example of abstinence from petty personal controversies, and of toleration for everything but lying; to be indifferent as to whether the work is recognised as mine or not, so long as it is done—are these my aims? 1860 will show.

In such a spirit we see his work carried out to the close, and the task laid down at last in quiet steadfastness and content. Such loyalty to high aims we find bearing witness to fuller faith in permanent spiritual realities than that in which Huxley himself was able to rest. It leaves with us a happier memory of his affectionate and strenuous life.

The volumes are enriched by a number of delightful portraits, beginning with one from a daguerreotype of 1846, taken just before Huxley, as a young man of twenty-one, sailed on the Rattlesnake, and ending with one of the old man, in 1895, the last year of his life, with a grandson on his knee.

THE MARRIAGE OF TRUE MINDS.*

A noble purpose should make a book, as a man, worth knowing, and when to a high aim a writer adds, as is the case with Theophila North, a very considerable artistic power of expression, with much good thought and poetic feeling to express, then the new acquaintanceship is a pleasure as well as a privilege. "The Marriage of True Minds" is a novel high in conception, pure and healthy in feeling, and should be welcome when so many novels nowadays have neither of these merits. Its heroine, Octavia, is that as yet unknown being, a woman born with great musical genius and wonderful gift for composing. But she is also a woman, and the problem of her life, and of the book, is how to to reconcile her art with her life, how to produce the perfect "octave," as I take it, "true to the kindred points of heaven and home." After student-life in Germany, where her rare promise has excited the musical world, and made her professors full of expectation, and where she has had the joy of sympathetic fellowship, she has to return home to a country house, where the wearisome "daily round" of small county sociabilities and common-place surroundings smother her gift. The woman in her has to suffer, for the man who would have been her true mate marries elsewhere, and Octavia in heart-hunger accepts and marries a good and true, but common-place, young barrister who has loved her all his life, but whose appreciation of music does not go beyond comic operas. To be a true wife she thinks it right to stifle her art, and to crush the passionate gift which is buried but not dead. Torn by the misery of the man who is her real soul's mate, and who, married to a butterfly woman of the world, is drowning his genius in drink, her love and her artist passion both cry out for freedom and tempt her to sin; but the thought of her unborn human child triumphs over the longing to give birth to spiritual children. Through "storm and stress" she arrives at a more perfect and selfless love, and learns to see that all love which forgets itself in the most apparently common-place souls is part of the infinite music of God. Then from love and righteousness meeting without thought of self there comes from her at last a glorious musical creation.

* "The Marriage of True Minds." By Theophila North. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

The work had qualities new in the history of music. For it was not that passionate striving after self-expression which is so general among composers; it was the expression of something higher than self—"an ever-fixèd mark" wherein alone the soul of man can find peace and true self-realisation.

What more there is in this interesting story we must leave our readers to discover for themselves. We welcome it as the work of one of our own household of faith, who under the veil she has adopted bears a name honoured for more than one generation in our midst. E. C. F.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

TRIBUTE TO THE HON. E. LYULPH STANLEY BY THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

AT the final meeting, on Nov. 22, of the School Board for London, which has now completed its three years' term of service, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie completed a longer term of service, having represented Southwark on successive Boards for the past twelve years. Of the energy and value of Mr. Bowie's services our readers are well aware. For some time he was one of the Whips of the Progressive party, and for the last three years has held the honourable post of Chairman of the School Accommodation and Attendance Committee. Mr. Bowie is to be congratulated on a record of no little distinction, and the Association, of which he is the secretary, is no less to be congratulated on having been able through him to render such signal service to the cause of popular education in London.

Those who frequent Essex Hall have long been familiar with the visits of the Hon. Lyulph Stanley, Vice-Chairman of the Board, and leader of the Progressive party, who has worked in close association with Mr. Bowie, and pleaded hard against his retirement.

MR. BOWIE'S TRIBUTE TO HIS LEADER.

At the final meeting of the Board, the resolution thanking Mr. Stanley for his services as vice-chairman of the Board, was moved by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie in the following words:—

"I rejoice that an opportunity has been given me by this motion, before retiring from the Board, of expressing my sense of personal regard for Mr. Stanley, and my appreciation of the great services rendered by him to London. For twelve years I have worked by his side: I suppose I have seen more of him, and been in closer touch with his plans and work, than any other member of the Board. It is a matter of regret that in severing my connection with the School Board I shall no longer be able to act as one of his helpers, just as it is a satisfaction that I have enjoyed that privilege so long. Some of us succeed, after a time, in becoming members of the School Board for a little corner here or there of this vast metropolis: Mr. Stanley is almost the only member for London. He is familiar with every district, nearly with every street and alley; he knows more about the schools in Southwark than I do, whereas I am practically ignorant of all but a very few schools in any other division. In making appointments or in giving promotion, he is almost alone in looking after the interests of London as a whole. He has devoted his great ability, his wide experience, his never-faltering enthusiasm to the cause of education in London; the monuments of his zeal for the children of the people adorn every district of the metropolis. The work of the London School Board has been his meat and drink, one might even add, his religion—and a very excellent and helpful religion of service on behalf of man it has proved. He has cared nothing for his own interests or reputation; but with singleness of purpose he has gone on his way, heedless of what men have said and thought of him. He has introduced a high standard of public service on the Board, and has helped to brace members to do the right, when it was not easy to do right. From his rich stores of classical and historical knowledge he has brought something of the spirit and temper of his friend Benjamin Jowett, the late Master of Balliol, into our debates, and so has lifted them out of the small parochialism into which they are too often apt to sink. His intimate knowledge of the Scriptures has frequently put to shame the clergy and ministers of religion on the Board. I know he has applied the lash, sometimes with great severity, upon those members who display ignorance or stupidity or cowardice: we have all suffered from his strokes at times—his friends perhaps even more than his opponents. Happily there is no ill-will or malice behind his sharp words, but a heart generous and noble in ways known only to the few. Mr. Stanley has never taken the trouble to make people understand him, he has never sought to advertise his magnificent services to the cause of education; had he done so, the people of London would then know, what we know, that among the many able and devoted public servants which the metropolis has had during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, she has had no one more consecrated and worthy than Mr. Lyulph Stanley."

OBITUARY.

MR. JAMES BUCK.

OUR Preston congregation has sustained a great loss through the death of Mr. James Buck, one of its oldest members and best-known workers. Although Mr. Buck has not been able to attend the services at Percy-street Chapel for over a year now, the constant inquiries about him from week to week, showed how dear he was to his fellow-worshippers. The end came on Thursday morning, Nov. 22, when he passed away in the presence of his family, after a long and painful illness borne with exemplary courage and cheerfulness. He was in his seventy-second year. It was gratifying to note the marked expression of public sympathy and respect evidenced at the funeral on Monday last. There was a large gathering of friends of all denominations and of various shades of opinion. In particular the deputation of Temperance workers was noticeable. Mr. Buck was known all over Preston, and for many miles around for his splendid advocacy by the Temperance cause. He was, perhaps, second only to Mr. Joseph Livesey in this respect, says one notice, in the Preston Herald. Certainly he spared neither himself nor his family in combating the drink evil. On one occasion he took his own piano a distance of some twenty miles to a Temperance meeting. This is but a typical instance of the downright enthusiasm with which he worked. He was a very popular speaker at open-air meetings, and large numbers assembled on Sunday afternoons in the Preston market-place to enjoy the homely wit and unfailing good humour which characterised his speeches. "A good life": that is, in short, the memory Mr. Buck leaves in the minds of those who knew him. The Rev. N. Anderton made special reference to Mr. Buck's death on Sunday morning last at the close of service.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ABOUT seven o'clock the other Sunday morning I was looking out of my window. It was grey and quiet. I could see a light in the attic of one house and in the basement of another, and I knew that the day's work was beginning. A servant here and there was getting up, or had gone to the kitchen, and was setting about the first business of the morning. What is the first business of the morning?

"To get breakfast ready?" No; there is something before that. "To light the fire?" Yes; that is the first thing to be done in every household these dull and damp November mornings—to light the fire, that the house may be warm and cheerful when the boys and girls come downstairs, and that breakfast may be ready in time for school. I can't think of anything that would upset the household so much, or take away the sense of comfort and of home so much, as missing this friendly fire, which warms us, and cooks for us, and serves us in so many ways. In our climate, I suppose, we could hardly live without it. It is our Preserver, our Restorer, our good Angel. And there in the peaceful Sunday morning the smoke was beginning to rise from one chimney after another, telling us that this faithful friend was beginning his daily work for us again.

But while I was thus looking a great puff of smoke suddenly swept past the window, much larger and heavier than the thin columns rising from the chimneys. Where did it come from? Could it be from the church, which is next us? Could it be from the empty house beyond? What was there in the neighbourhood that could be on fire? And the smoke came thicker and thicker. Certainly it was a fire. Then there came a crackling of wood blazing. "Oh!" we said, "it must be those wooden buildings at the end of the street." When we looked out of the front window, we could see quite plainly that it was an old wooden shop, used by a carpenter and painter. What a bright fire it was! There were oil, turpentine, dry wood—the very things for the fire to feed on, and it was blazing up like a huge Fifth of November bonfire. And nobody was in the street.

In two or three minutes I heard the policeman's whistle. Then, in two or three minutes more, the firemen with their brass helmets came running up. Some dragged along the great hose, and soon the steam-engine was sending a great stream of water hissing into the midst of the blaze.

It didn't take long to put the fire out. The firemen could reach it very easily. In half-an-hour our excitement was all over. Even the next house was saved. But for that half-hour we all felt fire was an enemy. It was something to be afraid of, something to be fought, to be put out. It was the Destroyer, the Consumer. It was strange, when you think of it. On one side of the house we could see where people were kindling their fires, trying to make them burn. And on the other side of the house we could see people trying with all their might to put the fire out, to stop its burning.

We talked about this in our children's service that afternoon. We tried to think of as many stories in the Bible as we could, that in some way had to do with fire. There were so many of them that we had to stop before we had gone half through them. How many, I wonder, can you think of? There is one, I hope, you will think of; and to make sure of this, I will tell you where to find it. It is in the third chapter of Daniel.

Then we learned two texts in which fire is spoken of. The first is in James—"The tongue," he says, "is a fire." How is our tongue like a fire? He tells us just how this thought came to him. He had seen, some day, a great fire burning down houses, perhaps streets of houses. And he remembered how that fire came from a little spark—a flamelet that any one might have blown out or stamped out. But no one did that. And the flame caught and spread till by-and-by it was beyond all human power to subdue it.

I can remember such a fire more than twenty-five years ago, when the great city of Chicago was burned down. Wooden houses, brick, stone, iron—it was all one to the devouring fire. It swept them all away; and the next morning thousands of harmless people could not even find where their homes had been. And all started from a little fire that might have been put out with a pail of water.

James had seen some such fire; and he thought of all the mischief and misery he had seen grow out of a thoughtless word, a false word, an angry word. How men's tempers had blazed, and ill-will and hatred spread, and passions flamed up till they were in a white heat of rage. No controlling them, no holding them, no reasoning with them. And such a little reason, such a little kindly feeling would have stopped it at first. "The tongue is a fire," he said. "The tongue is a fire."

The second text was in Hebrews—"Our God is a consuming fire." That seemed, at first, a terrible way to think of God. God is a fire—a fire that destroys and burns. So it is terrible, till we understand what it is God is always consuming. God is a consuming fire to the waste and rubbish, the useless, and the dead, and the evil things of this world, which, were they not always being consumed, would choke and corrupt life even more than they now do. These are what God is always burning up. He is the fire that cleanses and purifies; and so His fire is the one we never need be afraid of either for the world or for ourselves.

Then we learned this verse, which some of you, perhaps, would like to learn too:—

Oh Thou Consuming Fire,
Why should I fear Thy flame?
Who purpose and desire
To burn what Thou shalt blame—
Ill weeds, and every briar
Of folly, sin, and shame.

WE are glad to hear that our reference last year to the work of the Noel Society led to some accession of membership, and hope that the following note may have the same happy result. The progress of the Society, which was founded in 1892, has been most encouraging, last year over 1,600 toys being distributed in London alone. A large branch in Birmingham does most excellent work, and branches of the Society have been started in Manchester and Bradford, the latter having already enrolled over 100 members. Anyone wishing to join or help at the various branches had better write for particulars to the respective honorary secretaries.

London: Miss K. M. Robinson, 162, Warwick-street, S.W.
Birmingham: Mrs. Cecil Crosskey, 443, Gillott-road, Edgbaston.
Manchester: Miss C. Squier, Stand Lodge, Radcliffe, Manchester.
Bradford: Miss G. B. Jeffrey, Oak Mount Manningham, Bradford.

This year the toys collected in London will be given to the Highway Board School, St. George-in-the-East, where the children are all miserably poor, and to many the toys will be the first they have ever possessed, most of the little girls having made shift with a piece of old rag "screwed up" for a doll. The distribution will take place on the afternoon of Christmas-Eve, and two trees will be decorated and lit up to give the children some idea of Christmas festivity, and be a happy remembrance for many days to come. Friends who are interested in the work and would like to help with the distribution will be warmly welcomed by the members of the Society at the School, which being a very large one, with over 1,500 children, will require a good many helpers. Contributions of toys or money to be sent to the hon. treasurer, Miss D. Nettlefold, Streatham-grove, Norwood.

AGNOSTIC OR BELIEVER.

"THE longer I live," wrote HUXLEY to CHARLES KINGSLEY forty years ago, "the more obvious it is to me that the most sacred act of a man's life is to say and to feel, 'I believe such and such to be true.'" He had just suffered a great bereavement, "the greatest sorrow perhaps of his whole life," in the death of his eldest child, a little lad of not quite four years old. He himself was then thirty-five years of age, and had fought through his earlier battle with the world. In reply to KINGSLEY'S letter of sympathy, he made this declaration :—

My convictions, positive and negative, on all the matters of which you speak, are of long and slow growth, and are firmly rooted. But the great blow which fell upon me seemed to stir them to their foundation, and had I lived a couple of centuries earlier I could have fancied a devil scoffing at me and them—and asking me what profit it was to have stripped myself of the hopes and consolations of the mass of mankind? To which my only reply was and is: Oh, devil! truth is better than much profit. I have searched over the grounds of my belief, and if wife and child and name and fame were all to be lost to me one after the other as the penalty, still I will not lie.

In those words HUXLEY declared the ruling passion of his life. He was a servant of truth, and as such rendered his most eminent services to the intellectual and moral life of his age. In our present issue will be found a notice of Mr. LEONARD HUXLEY'S life of his father; it displays with great vividness and sustained interest the progress of a career resolute in service of many kinds, but always dominated by the eager search for truth and the determination to be true at any cost. HUXLEY'S special work was in the great field of natural science, and this constant occupation with the facts of physical life doubtless gave the special bent to his mind, and yet he never lost sight of the wider bearing of his subject, but maintained the keenest interest in all human affairs. The temper in which he undertook his work is finely expressed in the following passage from that same letter to CHARLES KINGSLEY, from which we have already quoted :—

Science seems to me to teach in the highest and strongest manner the great truth which is embodied in the Christian conception of entire surrender to the will of God. Sit down before fact as a little child, be prepared to give up every preconceived notion, follow humbly wherever and to whatever abysses nature leads, or you shall learn nothing. I have only begun to learn content and peace of mind since I have resolved at all risks to do this.

And further on (it was a very long letter of the most frank unveiling of his own inner life), referring to the suggestion that a belief in immortality was necessary to hold men in the path of virtue, he thus speaks of what had been the redemption of his own life :—

When I look back, what do I find to have been the agents of my redemption? The hope of immortality or of future reward? I can honestly say that for these fourteen years such a consideration has not entered my head. No, I can tell you exactly what has been at work. Sartor Resartus led me to know that a deep sense of religion was compatible with the entire absence of theology. Secondly, science and her methods gave me a resting-place independent of authority and tradition. Thirdly, love opened up to me a view of the sanctity of human nature, and impressed me with a deep sense of responsibility.

If at this moment I am not a worn-out, debauched, useless carcass of a man, if it has been or will be my fate to advance the cause of science, if I feel that I have a shadow of a claim on the love of those about me, if in the supreme moment when I looked down into my boy's grave my sorrow was full of submission and without bitterness, it is because these agencies have worked upon me, and not because I have ever cared whether my poor personality shall remain distinct for ever from the All from whence it came and whither it goes.

HUXLEY called himself an Agnostic, as one who had no knowledge with which to solve the problem of existence, and was inclined to think the problem insoluble, and yet the nearer we are brought to his essentially noble nature, the clearer it becomes how firm his hold was on some of those elements of a true spiritual life, from which alone abiding faith can be built up.

HUXLEY'S great service was in his championship of truth in the realms of science, demonstrating the true order of Nature, as against old beliefs supposed to be guaranteed by the authority of religion. It was a conflict inevitable in those days, for the breaking down of superstition, and the clearing of the ground for a more wholesome and progressive religious life, in which, as with him who could not yet accept the larger hope, truth should be supreme. Where, as it appears to us, he missed the way was in expecting to find the fuller revelation of GOD, which religion needs, behind the phenomena of the natural world. He had been engaged in pointing out the contradiction between the scientific interpretation of Nature and the old theological conception of sudden creation and miraculous interference with the appointed order of the world; and he felt, as he said in a later letter to KINGSLEY, that there was an "impassable gulf between the anthropomorphism (however refined) of theology and the passionless impersonality of the unknown and unknowable which science shows everywhere underlying the thin veil of phenomena." But science did not really show that there was only that "passionless impersonality" behind phenomena. HUXLEY himself acknowledged that he did not know what was there, and science had no power to reveal it. What he saw was that the order of the universe was rigorously impartial, and that in obedience to its laws lay our best hope of a satisfying life. He thought the order on the whole kind and beneficent, and yet knew that it would crush him, if he resisted its law. What he declared his inability to see was that there could be any relation between the unknown source of that order and the FATHER in whom the Christian trusts.

If he looked for the establishment of such a relation by means of a more complete interpretation of natural phenomena, HUXLEY was of course doomed to inevitable disappointment. Natural science does but establish more and more completely the nexus of phenomena, and has nothing to say of what is behind. The thought of GOD comes to us from within, born of the spiritual conviction of what we are, and what the source of such personal life, strong in thought, in love, in the hunger for righteousness, must be; and then with GOD we face the steadfast order of the universe, as furnishing the conditions of our present life. HUXLEY said once in a letter to DARWIN, and repeated it apparently in another letter four years later, that "Infinite benevolence need not have invented pain and sorrow at all." But how did he know, or how could he have known, supposing him to have believed in that "Infinite benevolence"? The truer instinct of religion is rather "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," while out of the profoundest sorrows and the sufferings of pure self-sacrifice have issued the unconquerable faith in Love as supreme and the ultimate source of all that is. There are mysteries of pain in the natural world that remain unsolved, and on every side we touch that beyond which we cannot penetrate; but for that very reason we are brought back to the quietness of trust, and to renewed devotion to the best that is in the heart of our own humanity, for so it is that we find the rock of our strength and the perennial fountain of our joy, in the deep assurance of the abiding presence of GOD. In his Romanes lecture HUXLEY seemed to many of his readers to have taken a great step, in declaring that the true ethical ideal for man was in resistance to the merely animal instinct which held him in the line of natural evolution; and elsewhere he affirmed that "prophetic Judaism" was the only religion which appealed to him. Along that line was the way of deliverance into a larger faith.

When HUXLEY died it was by his special direction that three lines, from a poem written by his wife, were inscribed on his tombstone:—

Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep;
For still He giveth His belovèd sleep,
And if an endless sleep He wills, so best.

We must stand with reqerence by the grave of a brave and faithful man, who would not utter a word beyond what he was convinced to be the truth, with thankfulness for what he achieved for the progress of knowledge, while we ponder those deeper things of the spiritual life to which, inspired by his character rather than his word, we may learn more fully to attain.

BROKEN SHELLS,

Gathered from the Shores of Thought.

IF any man would buy Wisdom, let him pay for it with Love; or Peace, let him exchange for that rare pearl the gauds and trappings of Luxury. If any would rejoice, let him open the eyes of his soul and be thankful; there is no joy like that which waits upon thankfulness, which is true worship, and lifts a man into the very presence of his God.

The young man sees Death afar off as a horror to be shunned. The old man sees it just in front of him and is not afraid. The ways of the world are pleasantly adorned with flowers and fruit, but the paths are full of stones and sharp-edged rocks, and the feet get weary as the day goes down.

When the cloud-curtain drifts across the sky, and the rude fingers of the West Wind tear out its delicate meshes, with what a merry face does the blue Sky-maiden peep through the rents, laughing and twinkling at dear mother Earth.

How shall I entice my soul to put away self-seeking? I want so many things, for comfort, for pleasure, for ambition. Shall I wait till some great grief makes life for me empty and worthless? Or shall I, while the sun still shines, reflect its warmth and beauty instead of hoarding them?

My good neighbour lives in his valley farm and his view is limited by the surrounding hills. I who have climbed those hills have seen the splendour of the distant prospect, with its lakes and forests and mountain precipices. Can I by any means make him comprehend the larger landscape without taking him up those hills to see it for himself?

DR. P. T. FORSYTH ON THE UNITARIANISM OF DR. MARTINEAU.

I.

DR. FORSYTH'S very thoughtful, and in some respects warmly appreciative, article on Dr. Martineau, in the April number of the London Quarterly Review, has been already noticed in the leading article of the INQUIRER for August 25.

As, however, Dr. Forsyth's paper is a most elaborate endeavour to show that the Unitarian idea of God as set forth in the writings of Dr. Martineau is, in comparison with the Trinitarian idea, philosophically shallow and spiritually ineffective, it seems desirable to examine somewhat in detail the grounds on which Dr. Forsyth bases this serious indictment of a conception of the Supreme Being which, as he himself admits, has commended itself to such "saints" as Channing and Martineau.

It is necessary, in the first place, to clearly apprehend the vital difference between Dr. Forsyth's Trinitarianism and the so-called Trinitarianism of such "broad" divines as Dr. Rashdall and Canon Wilberforce; for, so far as we can see, this latter Trinitarianism does not differ in any essential respect from Dr. Martineau's Unitarianism. When, for instance, Dr. Rashdall asserts that "the sum and substance of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is that God is Power and Wisdom and Love; that God is revealing Himself ever more and more perfectly in the souls of men, and is revealed fully and perfectly in Christ," and when Canon Wilberforce teaches, as Spinoza taught before him, that "Humanity is the Word made flesh, and the deepest and inmost in man is, therefore, the self-utterance of God in the Christ"; these preachers virtually surrender the Trinitarianism against which the Unitarianism of Martineau is a protest, for the immanence of God in Christ does not in their view appear to take Jesus of Nazareth out of the category of humanity. In all prophetic and saintly souls the Word is in some measure made flesh; and it would seem that to such preachers as the above-mentioned (and it is obvious to anyone who reads the Christian World Pulpit that there is a rapidly increasing number of them, both in the Anglican Church and out of it) the uniqueness of Jesus simply means, as it does to Dr. Martineau, that in his character and teachings we have the most perfect revelation of the Father possible under the conditions of human nature. Dr. Rashdall's Trinity, as he tells us in his admirable treatise on "Doctrine and Development," really asserts "the very essence of Christian Theism, i.e., that God is not mere Power or mere Thought or mere Love, but the three combined." At the first glance this doctrine looks like a modern resuscitation of the Sabellian heresy, but Dr. Rashdall very properly explains that his view materially differs from Sabellianism "inasmuch as it asserts that these different activities are essential to God's nature, not appearances or modes which can be put on or off." Precisely so: this is exactly Dr. Martineau's position. Hence, as we said before, there is apparently no essential difference between this sort of Trinitarianism and the Unitarianism which Dr. Forsyth undertakes to criticise and refute.

But when we turn to the Trinitarianism of the London Quarterly Review we find that we are dealing with a conception of the Godhead totally differing from that which is presented in Canon Wilberforce's or Dr. Rashdall's discourses. And this difference is fundamental and vital in two respects. Firstly, Dr. Forsyth's God is really not a unipersonal, but a tripersonal being: the Divine unity, he says, embraces a "society" which consists of three "mutually interpenetrating" personalities. Secondly, Dr. Forsyth's Jesus is, to use his own words, "not a man perfectly filled with God" as Dr. Martineau's is, but a being simply identical with God. God was, in the case of Jesus, "present not inside the personality" (as He is in mankind in general) but "as the personality." Hence the sacrifice and the death of Jesus "are in the Divine nature, and in the death of Christ, as Hegel quotes, Gott selbst ist todt."

We will in the present paper mainly confine ourselves to an examination of those parts of Dr. Forsyth's many-sided article in which he contends that the profoundest philosophy and sociology of our time powerfully illustrate and confirm the revealed dogma of a tri-une God; and that, accordingly, Dr. Martineau's philosophy, though it has considerable merit, yet, through missing an insight into this basal truth of a three-fold society in the Godhead, lacks the one thing which is above all others needful, and hence shows itself essentially defective and uninspiring alike on its ethical and sociological and on its religious side.

Now, in the first place, it is to be noted that Dr. Forsyth and his coadjutors in this matter, such as Canon Gore and Dr. Fairbairn, are not approaching this question of the Trinity in the old way. What is kindling their enthusiasm is the conviction that, altogether apart from what they regard as special Revelation, the recent developments of philosophical thought and of social ideas and sentiments all point to, and harmonise with, this conception of a "three-fold society" in the Godhead; and that at the same time recent sociological insight has enabled us to see that the dogma of the Trinity is by no means an arbitrary and isolated truth, inasmuch as what we call "society" or "humanity" is, in the opinion of Dr. Forsyth, a similar instance of an organic psychological unity embracing in itself a multitude of personalities. Hence what constitutes the pith and animus of this recent crusade against a Unitarian view of the Godhead, is that its advocates believe that they have succeeded in rationalising this dogma of the Trinity, of divesting it to a large extent of its unattractive character as a complete mystery; and their hope and expectation is that by an ingenious blending of ancient orthodoxy with recent idealism they may render the former more palatable to cultivated modern tastes, and so divert the interest of religious thinkers not only from denominational Unitarianism but, which is of still greater consequence, from that captivating doctrine of the Incarnation in Dr. Rashdall's sense, which, as Dr. Forsyth and his friends are quite aware, is only in name distinguishable from Unitarianism.

This curious combination of Hegelianism with ancient dogmatism—the grotesque incongruity of which we will refer to afterwards — will explain two marked features in Dr. Forsyth's article. It will explain, in general, why he refers to Unitarians with such condescension and pity as being unfortunate, but "incorrigible" individualists whom the grand progress of modern thought has left hopelessly behind the age; and it will also explain, in particular, why he is so confident that Dr. Martineau, "by the time that his two chief philosophic works were in print, was isolated and left behind, and knew that he was so." Readers of Hegelian literature are familiar with this self-satisfied air of superiority. If due allowance is made for this somewhat premature assurance, the following interesting estimate of Dr. Martineau as a philosophical thinker will be found to contain some important and well-expressed truth, combined, however, we think, with serious error:—

Martineau [says Dr. Forsyth] had a saddened sense that ere he published his maturest views thought had moved away from his position, and he was no longer in the van of philosophical progress. He delayed his books too long. He came out in the eighties with what would have been most relevant in the sixties. He won his battle by reconnaissances in force before he brought up his main body. His essays and teaching had made his contribution to the world of thought, which had gone on to new developments and new conquests. The utilitarianism which he fought so well had moved forward to a far larger construction of things in evolutionary ethics; and his intuitionalism had expanded to meet this enlargement in the shape of Hegelian idealism. He stood between Mill and Green, Darwin and Bradley. He destroyed the hard, old individualism; but he did not adapt himself to the new universalism. He remained to the last hampered by the relics of an old atomism which made him suspicious of the new organic view of society.

We quite agree with Dr. Forsyth that it would have been an advantage if Dr. Martineau had published his greater works much nearer the time when the main ideas in them took permanent shape in his own mind. But Dr. Forsyth is egregiously mistaken if he imagines, as he seems to do, that Dr. Martineau towards the close of his life was saddened by the apprehension that recent philosophical doctrines, whether of the Spencerian or of the Hegelian type, would permanently supplant his most cherished basal ideas. He freely admitted that there were in these evolutionary and idealist treatises true and valuable conceptions and suggestions which, had he been able to re-cast his works, would have caused him in some measure to modify his views and his mode of expression; but he firmly believed, and certainly many of the ablest living thinkers agree with him, that in so far as this "new universalism," as Dr. Forsyth calls it, maintains that none of our moral self-determinations in seasons of temptation could be other than they actually are; or teaches the doctrine that the individual man and his development is a mere necessary product and organ of society; or denies the existence of direct personal communion between the individual soul and the Father within it, such literature can have but a one-sided and transient influence, seeing that it is to a great extent the imperfect result of exclusive absorption in intellectual interests; and therefore is, and will be, rejected as erroneous, so soon as the ethical and religious life reasserts its strength, and claims to exert its due influence on the formation and formulation of ultimate philosophical ideas and convictions. And indeed it is already the fact that more than one most distinguished professor of philosophy, who once held the new views which appear to have fascinated Dr. Forsyth, have on such fundamental questions as the nature of the Self and the Freedom of the Will now passed into confessed agreement with Dr. Martineau's position. And there are not wanting even in Oxford at present conspicuous signs of a growing dissatisfaction with Hegelian psychology.

On reading the concluding sentences in the above extract, the question naturally suggests itself whether Dr. Forsyth seriously believes that if Dr. Martineau had come to appreciate and accept the main principles of Mr. F. H. Bradley's philosophy, and had modified his ethical and theological conclusions accordingly, his writings would have become more acceptable and helpful to the great religious world than they now are. We can well believe that the philosophy of ethics and religion which is now shaping itself in the most earnest thought of our time will derive from the writers whom Dr. Forsyth mentions some aid in the formation of a more adequate conception of the mode of God's immanence and activity both in outward Nature and in the inner life of man; but whatever may be the indebtedness of the future philosophy of religion to writers like Green and Bradley, we feel no doubt that it will gratefully acknowledge a far deeper and more vital indebtedness to those theistic and libertarian philosophers of whom Lotze and Martineau are the highest recent representatives. It would certainly be remarkable if a satisfying religious philosophy should derive any of its most vital principles from a work such as Mr. Bradley's "Appearance and Reality"—a work which lends little or no support to any belief (Trinitarian or Unitarian) in a personal God, which contemptuously rejects the Freedom of the Will as beneath the notice of all self-respecting thinkers, and which regards the doctrine of a Future Life as in a high degree improbable. When the gifted Novalis said that, though philosophy can bake no bread, yet it can give us God, Freedom and Immortality, it must have been a philosophy singularly unlike Mr. Bradley's which he had in view.

It does not appear, then, that this "new universalism" is a very likely quarter in which to look for the dawning of such new intellectual light as shall make clear to all thoughtful minds that this dogma of a tri-une God is really after all the central truth of all philosophy—a truth in which is contained, for those who have eyes to see, the only clue to the solution of the deepest problems in ethics, in sociology, and in religion.

For what is this grand conception which is destined, according to Dr. Forsyth, to make the Trinity as satisfying to the intellect of the critical philosopher as it has heretofore been to the faith of the unquestioning believer? This new idea which has been proclaimed by the advanced thinkers whom Dr. Martineau unfortunately lagged behind, is the doctrine of the Organic Unity of Society—a Unity which, in Dr. Forsyth's view, is the earthly counterpart and analogue of that sublime social Unity of three Personalities in the essential life of the Eternal God. No wonder, then, that Dr. Forsyth so warmly congratulates his Trinitarian colleagues, and so feelingly commiserates Dr. Martineau and the Unitarians generally on the unspeakable loss they have sustained through not having sufficiently explored the "new universalism," and so missed seeing (as, strange to say, the new universalists themselves have also done) that in the above sociological dogma we have the clearest illustration and the most powerful confirmation of the transcendent revelation of the tri-une, or social, nature of the Deity.

Dr. Forsyth's method of blending this recent sociological theory with the doctrine of the Trinity is thus presented:—

The question of the Trinity is the question of the interpenetration of persons in a higher personality, the union of more than one in a spiritual personality, as suggested in the solidarity of a race of human individuals, no one of whom exists in an abstract and solitary self-identity.

The words we have italicised show that Dr. Forsyth is here following the lead of some, but by no means all, Hegelian writers, such as Mr. Bradley and Professor Muirhead, who maintain that the individual man is no separate unit, no independent being in any sense, and that when he is so spoken of he is incorrectly described, inasmuch as this so-called entity or unity is nothing more than "an abstraction" made by human thought from the only real unit, the social organism. That this view of the nature of the individual man is really adopted by Dr. Forsyth is also evident from his endorsement of the saying that "Collective humanity is really the true man." Of course if this is a correct account of human nature and of its relation to society, all true freedom of moral choice, all real moral responsibility, is, so far as regards the individual man, entirely out of the question. The self-determinations which are continually modifying a man's character for good or ill cannot possibly on this theory be in any degree other than they really are. Each man is precisely that which the social unit, or organism, makes him. Heredity and environment determine with equally invariable necessity every particular trait in the character of the hero and the philanthropist as in the character of the criminal, the miser, and the voluptuary. That which all Christians regard as the momentous fact of Sin—and which orthodox Christians like Dr. Forsyth consider to be of such a terrible and fundamental nature that nothing short of the death of one the three mutually interpenetrating persons on the Godhead can avail to neutralise its evil effects—this, from the point of view of that section of the new universalists with which Dr. Forsyth is here allying himself, is simply an interesting but complex question of social pathology. Indeed, in the view of this school of thought it is intrinsically absurd to impute the sin or crime to the individual who is said to commit it. He, it is true, happens to be the last link in the chain of secondary causation; but in reality he is but one of the channels, or vehicles, through which the unitary life of the social organism expresses itself. If there is anything to be truly called "sin" at all, it is simply the act of the collective community. But if that social unit called "Society" had a unitary consciousness and will (which it has not, but which it certainly ought to have if it bears the remotest resemblance or analogy to Dr. Forsyth's idea of the tri-une Godhead), it would naturally reply that the "sin" ought not to be imputed to it either; for that it in turn is only the product of biological and psychological necessities. We had, however, better not carry these deductions further, or we shall have to inquire whether the "divine unity of the three mutually interpenetrating persons" can possibly feel anything more than an intellectual interest in the inevitable evolution of this collective humanity. We only mention this to show the absurdities and the insurmountable ethical and theological difficulties which are necessarily produced by this theory that the individual man has no real initiative and no free causality, but is merely a particular organ of a collective unity called society or humanity. To us, we must confess, it appears beyond measure strange that a thoughtful and highly gifted Christian minister, in his eagerness to uphold a purely speculative theological dogma, should thus identify himself with a view of human nature and of human character which, we cannot but think, is the direct antithesis of that view of the individual soul, of its personal freedom and responsibility, and of its immediate relationship with the indwelling Father, which pervades and characterises the best authenticated utterances of Jesus of Nazareth.

We have little doubt, however, that the readiness with which Dr. Forsyth has embraced this dogma that "collective humanity is the real man" is to be explained by his admitted acceptance of the Hegelian doctrine that in our moral choices and decisions, "it is the whole self that acts in each choice, and the whole self is a great tangle of mixed motives which cannot be exposed and valued apart." It is obvious that if this is a correct account of the nature of the Self and of its self-determinations in temptation, all real freedom of choice between possible alternatives becomes impossible and unintelligible. We cannot talk of "a great tangle of motives" being free to choose between alternatives. One of the most valuable of Dr. Martineau's permanent contributions to ethical thought is, we think, his thorough analysis and lucid exposure of this non-Christian psychology by which Dr. Forsyth has allowed himself to be captivated. And here we have a striking instance of the glaring inconsistencies in which Dr. Forsyth has involved himself in this elaborate endeavour to blend together very new Hegelianism with very old Christian dogmas.

In his doctrine of the Self, as we have seen, he represents human nature as so constituted that it is inconceivable that any man's moral character should have developed in the slightest degree differently from what it has done; but in another part of his article he finds fault with Dr. Martineau's conception of God, on the ground that it does not afford a satisfactory rationale of Divine Forgiveness. Now Dr. Martineau's account of man's freedom to sin, of God's grace in affording new motives and new opportunities, of man's repentance, and of God's consequent forgiveness is, at any rate, perfectly self-consistent; but what are we to say of a theory which first admits that no so-called sinner could possibly have left his so-called sins uncommitted, and then proceeds to elaborate out of a threefold conception of the Godhead, a means of forgiving the unfortunate product of heredity and environment? Surely if the Eternal had constituted human nature after the fashion which Dr. Forsyth has borrowed from the "new universalism," the only kind of forgiveness admissible in such a case would be that described by Omar Khayyám, whose view of the nature of the human Self appears to have been closely akin to Dr. Forsyth's :—

Oh Thou, who Man of baser Earth didst make
And ev'n with Paradise devise the Snake:
For all the Sin wherewith the Face of Man
Is blacken'd—Man's forgiveness give—and take!

DR. WILLIAM SHEPHERD, OF GATEACRE.

Sir,—In The Inquirer of Nov. 17 there appears a notice of Mr. J. L. Thornely's sketch of the history of Gateacre Chapel, but the writer has fallen into an error in ascribing the lines on his grave to Lord Brougham. The lines you give are on the tombstone in the chapel-yard, and are by the late Edward Rushton, who was stipendiary magistrate for Liverpool. Mr. Rushton was in many ways a most remarkable and interesting man. Though originally a tradesman, so struck with his abilities were Mr. Canning, Dr. Shepherd, and others of his friends, that they urged him to study for the bar, which he did successfully and attained great distinction in the profession. There was a certain fitness in this tribute to the memory of his old friend the Doctor, as when Rushton's father died not only did the Rev. William Shepherd carefully edit a small volume (1824) of poems and other writings by him, but it was accompanied by an appreciative sketch of the author, a true lover of liberty, at a time when the expression of that sentiment had in it no mean element of danger; and in the lines "An Epistle to Edward Rushton," at the close of the volume the Doctor tells of his friend's fearless advocacy of the cause of the negro slave.

The epitaph on the marble tablet in the chapel to the memory of Dr. William Shepherd is the one by Lord Brougham, his old friend. It is surmounted by a bust, the work of Isaac Jackson, of Liverpool, and its completion was announced to the subscribers in a circular dated Nov. 22, 1850, by Mr. James Thornely, Mr. J. L. Thornely's father.

Some further lines were written on the occasion of Dr. Shepherd's death, which as they are very unlikely to have come before your readers may interest them. They are by a man whose noble character and high poetic attainments have never been adequately set forth.

Lines written under a portrait of the Rev. Dr. Shepherd by the Rev. John Johns*:—

Thou of long days and honours! on whose head
The storms of Faction all their rage have shed,
And on whose reverend pile of thoughtful brow
Flourishes all too much the almond bough,
Too much for those who fain would see thee wield
The strength of youth in Freedom's holy field,
Is this thy likeness? Yes! we here see live
All that mere form and light and shade could give
Of him, who left the Muses' kindred choir,
The Sage's Scroll, the Poet's rivalled lyre,
To wrench the Bigot's torch, the Tyrant's chain,
To brave arm'd Faction on her chosen plain,
And bear Truth's colours on through good and ill,
In an outnumber'd cause, unvanquished still!—
As the smooth lake the mountain's form, this page
Gives back the tracery of majestic age;
Unflattered, unimpaired, thy very face
Looks from this paper, where thy name we trace—
A needless aid—for who, that once had seen,
Would fail to recognise thy form and mien?
Not I, at least, who here at once regard
The Pastor, Patriot, Scholar, Sage, and Bard,
And who, while framing this unvarnish'd line,
In silence supplicate the Will Divine,
That distant, for our sakes, not thine, may be
The sunset of thy bright mortality,
The hour, by friendship feared, to virtue blest
When Roscoe's Friend shall share in Roscoe's rest.

* Mr. Johns, author of the well-known hymn "Come, kingdom of our God," was a Devonshire man, who came from Crediton, to be first minister to the poor in Liverpool.

The Rev. J. C. Hirst, of Gateacre, also writes, calling attention to a slip in our notice, quoting the price of Mr. Thornely's pamphlet as 6s. instead of 6d., and sends us the inscription on the monument in the chapel, written by Lord Brougham, which is as follows:—

Sacred to the memory of William Shepherd, LL.D., for fifty-six years minister of this chapel. A man of undeviating integrity in all the relations of life; an accomplished scholar and classical writer; conversant with ancient and modern languages; well versed in the literature of both. Eminent for his wit, which was original and racy; of remarkable sagacity in judging of men and things. A staunch supporter of constitutional freedom. The undaunted enemy of oppression and abuse. A formidable adversary when his principles were assailed. A warm and steadfast friend at all times. Towards deserving objects generous beyond his means. Devoting his life to the useful and honourable office of teaching and the sacred duties of his pastoral calling.

Revered by his flock.
Beloved by his friends.
Respected by all.

Born Oct. 11, 1768. Died July 21, 1847.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove sends us the following correction, referring to his Yorkshire Letter of last week:—"In the mention of Dewsbury ministers in last week's Provincial Letter the name of Mr. Brinkworth was by accident substituted for Broadbent. A graver mistake was the omission of any mention of Mr. Constable's ministry, which was a very long one for Dewsbury, extending from 1885 to 1890—if I am not mistaken, the very longest in the short history of the congregation. They were five years of comparative peace and prosperity, such as were not known before, nor have been since; if we could find such another constable of the peace we should do well.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE BOYS IN OUR GREAT CITIES.—II.

FOLLOWING up the article on the above subject in last week's issue of THE INQUIRER, I am glad to be able to give now, in these columns, a brief description of the working of the 1st Company of the Boys' Own Brigade at Stamford-street Chapel, London. It is given in the hope that others engaged in work among boys will adopt the same means of attaining the end we all desire and join with us in forming a strong and useful organisation.

It was with much regret that the officers of this Company left the Boys' Brigade, admiring as they did its methods of work and its workers, and so it comes about that the new organisation is, in many respects, modelled on the parent Brigade, its object being "to increase pure and upright living among boys and to promote habits of help, obedience, discipline, self-respect, and all that tends towards true manliness." How do we try to do this in our "1st Company"? I shall endeavour to explain.

The boys come to us from workshops and offices (and alas! sometimes homes) where they are surrounded by sounds and sights tending to produce unhealthy and unclean thoughts, and we clearly recognise the fact that so far as we can overcome these evil influences by giving our boys food for pure and healthy thoughts, so far will we gain the desired end.

We take, then, our "raw recruit" and introduce him on some Thursday evening to the Company at "Parade Drill," and here he finds just what attracts him: a number of boys of his own age engaged in the many evolutions of marching drill and physical exercises—all acting together under command, all happy, and plainly showing him that they are stronger and more fit than himself, and he longs to join them. But first he must go through his weeks of recruit drill—and he is thus tested. Provided his enthusiasm remains with him during this time (it generally increases) he becomes at last a "private" and, in full accoutrement, looking decidedly smarter and brighter than before, he joins his comrades at drill, learning with them "obedience, discipline, and self-respect."

With moderate success we have now gained one point—we have given our youth one interesting and absorbing subject for thought; and only those who have used the method know its advantage. Of course this is not all; we must give our boy more opportunity still for growing in bodily strength, and this is supplied at the gymnasium. To this, once a week, the boys come to swing their dumbbells and use the "bars" and "horse" as only boys know how, and they are happy in their strength and think on ways and means of increasing it further—and we have gained another point.

But we must not stop here. Our motto says to us "Quit you like men—Be strong!" But there is more required than physical strength. On another evening the Company meets at the "Social Club." Here the officer has an opportunity of appearing in his true light—that of an elder brother to the boys, joining in quiet conversation with them on many matters, discussions on current topics and enjoyable games. And what can be found to better occupy the mind of a boy than a good book? Here he may have such for the asking from the "Company Library," a selection of really good and interesting books.

We desire to promote the habit of help, our "Object" says, the habit of lending a hand to all God's creatures whenever possible, and we bring this object specially to the fore-front in the "Ambulance Class." Here a good doctor friend devotes his energy and many valuable evenings to teaching our lads that most noble of arts, rendering aid to the injured. It is a subject which elder boys especially enter into heart and soul, and that it occupies their minds during many of their spare hours is very apparent; how far, however, the lessons lead to practical aid being rendered in cases of accident in workshop and in the street is not publicly known, for the London boy is modest when he has done a good deed—and may he ever remain so!

Besides those mentioned above, a great many other activities may be introduced in connection with such Companies: other classes and clubs, marches to places of interest, or games, &c., on Saturdays, "Sports days" and Summer Camps, but on these I must not dwell.

With the object expressed above, our Brigade is open to receive as members boys and officers of all denominations and churches: does this mean that we neglect altogether the spiritual education of the lads? No, a thousand times, no. When we have in our organisation (as we hope to have some day) many Companies, then in each one the members will naturally be taught the religious views of the officers of that Company. With us this teaching is purely Unitarian, and our Sunday morning class and monthly "Church Parades" are among the most important meetings of all.

Some may say that most of these meetings might be quite as successful without the introduction of the Brigade spirit at all, but we do not believe this to be the case. Having obtained a hold on the boys by means of the esprit de corps which is so evident in all good Brigade Companies, one finds the great secret of success. The officers become true comrades and brothers to the boys, entering into their lives and making them feel that they have true friends in the world, interested not only in their temporary happiness, but building the foundations for their future well-being. And by learning the habit of obedience to rules and trust in the makers of these rules, it is believed that the boys will appreciate more fully in future years of their lives the value of obedience to higher and mightier laws and a firm and manly trust in the highest law-giver of all, our all-loving Father.

I therefore conclude by earnestly advising any of the workers among "the boys in our great cities" who can do so to at least try for a season the method described above, for keeping in touch with the elder boys in our schools.

Each new Company joining the organisation gives fresh inspiration to those already members, and I shall be exceedingly glad to supply further information as to the practical working of the Brigade to all desirous of starting and conducting Companies.

The following practical details, extracted from the annual "Membership Card" of the 1st Company, may serve to demonstrate the methods of work adopted:—

TERMS OF ENROLMENT.

1. Boys wishing to enrol as recruits must satisfy the officers as to the following:—
   (a) They must be over twelve and under seventeen years old.
   (b) They must regularly attend a Sunday-school or other society sanctioned by the officers.
   (c) They must obtain the written consent of their parents or guardians.
2. Recruits become full members if, after six weeks' recruit drill, they are considered efficient by the officers.
3. No entrance fee is charged, but ½d. per week is paid by each member of the Company.
4. Members must provide themselves with their own caps, belts, and haversacks, costing in all 2s.

RULES.

Members must give prompt and cheerful obedience to their officers and non-commissioned officers.

Members must at all times endeavour to behave in a gentlemanly and honourable way.

Members must come on parade sharp to the hour, looking smart and clean.

The "Company Committee" shall consist of all officers and non-coms., and shall meet when required for general business. Complaints and requests from the members as to the management of the Company must be brought up at these meetings, and at no other time.

Promotions to the rank of lance-corporal shall be made by examination, such examination to be set and judged by the captain and other officers; all other promotions may or may not be made by examination as the officers decide.

Five marks shall be awarded to each lad at drill parades: one each for "Present," "Early," "Neatness," "Drill," and Subscription. One mark will be awarded for each attendance at Church parades or route marches. Bad behaviour at any meeting of the Company will render a lad liable to lose marks gained at the drill parades, &c.

KHASI HILLS UNITARIAN UNION.

October, 1900.

THE seventh anniversary of the Jowai Unitarian Free School was celebrated on Sept. 14. The school-house was tastefully decorated with flowers, ferns, pictures, &c. The programme included a Royal salute by the boys with the school flag and the Union Jack. A selection of physical drill was gone through by the boys to the tune of the songs by the children. A party of the boys recited some poetical selections, and then the manager read the annual report of the school. Four children were sent up to the L. P. examination and three passed, one of whom got a scholarship of three rupees a month for two years. There were seventy-four children on the roll on Sept. 1, 1900, with three teachers. Beside the three R's, sewing and knitting, music by the tonic sol-fa method, drilling and manners were also taught in the school. Mrs. Rita distributed the prizes (books and clothes for poor children). A short address was then made by Mr. S. E. Rita, the local magistrate. The needlework of the girls was examined by Mrs. Rita, who expressed herself pleased with it. The school was inspected by the Director of Public Instruction and by the Sub-Inspector of Schools during the year. It is proposed to start a carpentry class as soon as funds are raised for purchasing tools, &c. This is the only regular day-school maintained by the English Unitarian Mission in the Khasi Hills. The proceedings came to an end with the singing of the National Anthem, "God Save the Queen." Mrs. Rita, with her usual generosity, gave a beautiful prize and ten rupees for the children. There were several other kind friends who kindly contributed to the prize fund. Copies of "Every Other Sunday," kindly sent us by Mr. K. G. Wells, of Boston, U.S.A., were also distributed to all children, who were much pleased.

The school enters into the eighth year, with high hopes of being the means of spreading the Liberal Faith and Civilisation among the hill-people.

From Sept. 27 to Oct. 7, 1900, I was in Shillong and the neighbourhood on a visit to our mission there. The church at Laban, a suburb of Shillong, was in a very flourishing condition, and the Unitarians there were very enthusiastic and full of hope. The church was in charge of U Már Singh, assisted by Durgá Singh, Robin Roy, and U Singbor, formerly a veteran of the Demon worship system. I twice visited the village of Máwpat, where a little Unitarian colony was being formed by the Unitarians of Laitlyngkot for the purpose of cultivation, as the soil of the place is good. I also visited Laitlyngkot. Instead of going to preach to these people, I myself received a lesson from their steadfastness, hopefulness and simplicity, and their implicit faith in God. The one thing needful is a devoted missionary to lead and instruct these people. An English or American missionary devoting himself to uplift these people will find himself amply rewarded in the end.

During my stay in Shillong I was invited to preach at the Máwkhar Brahmo Somaj, which I gladly did. I was also asked to speak twice at the meetings of the Khasi Young Men's Association, a new organisation, started less than a year ago.

In my first lecture I spoke on the endurance of Faith and Hope and the need of the young society to have these. Members may dwindle down to a few supporters, but faith and hope will endure, and the society will ultimately flourish again. One of the illustrations I cited was the recent incident in the Boer War: General Buller had faith in his ability to relieve Ladysmith, and had hope to drive away the besieging Boers. Although three or four times he was driven back across the River Tugelá and lost many guns and men, his faith and hope were never driven away or captured, and in the end these triumphed and the besieged town relieved.

Its objects are the promotion of social and moral progress, and the promotion of the knowledge of the one True God. Is not this the outcome of the preaching of the Liberal Religion by the Unitarians and Brahmos? At the back of this young society is Babu Jeebon Roy, retired magistrate, who is the most enlightened Khasi, and has done a great deal of public good. He has now a press in Shillong, in which he employs women also as compositors and distributors. He has written many educational books which we are using. He is very desirous of spreading the knowledge of the one True God, but objects to the name Unitarian or Brahmo.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

Manchester Domestic Mission, Willert-street.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—This year, I regret to say, the word urgent must be added to that of appeal, for already there is considerable poverty in our district in consequence of sickness and shortness of work and the higher prices of food and coals. To cope with this it will be necessary that the amount received for the poor's purse be largely augmented. With regard to our Christmas appeal, I am in full hope that friends will be as generous as in previous years. We have been enabled to give Christmas cheer to a number of very poor people, and also to provide an evening of real enjoyment for upwards of 300 children and 150 adults. Beyond this it has been our practice to present each scholar with a useful garment. If those in happier circumstances could realise the conditions under which our people live they would recognise what a boon all this is to them year by year. Friends will greatly help by sending money, left-off clothing, children's garments or toys, which will be gratefully received by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester.

Mansford-street Church and Mission.—The Rev. W. G. Cadman thanks the friends who have helped in former years, and again appeals for liberal help towards (1) the Christmas fund which ensures Christmas dinners in many poor homes, the various Christmas parties and entertainments at the Mission, and provides a useful present (generally clothing or a book) for each of 300 Sunday scholars; (2) the poor's purse, which is at present worse than empty. This fund is used chiefly in assisting in several small pensions, and in helping the sick and aged. Parcels of clothing of every description, new and worn, will be thankfully received. All communications should be addressed to the Rev. W. G. Cadman, The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.

Blackpool: Banks street.—On Wednesday week a most successful tea-meeting and entertainment were held in the new schoolroom, both largely attended. The chief part of the entertainment was a dramatic sketch, which proved most interesting and amusing. The congregation is showing great activity in every department. The new buildings are nearly completed, the painting and decoration of the church, and the repairing of the organ, are proceeding rapidly, and the various institutions connected with the church are working satisfactorily. The Sunday-school has improved since the new schoolroom was opened; the newly-formed Band of Hope is growing, and the Literary and Debating Society is also making progress.

Bolton: Bank-street.—A beautiful memorial window, the gift of Mr. John Lawson, in memory of his parents, was dedicated at the services on Sunday, Nov. 25. In the morning the devotional service was conducted by the assistant minister, the Rev. E. S. Hicks, B.A., and the sermon, on "Hope, the Anchor of the Soul," preached by the senior minister, the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. At the evening service Mr. Street lectured on "Longfellow," to a large congregation, this being the first of a course of lectures on "Great Men of the Century." The memorial window (the work of Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne, London) is symbolic of "Hope," and is the centre of three; it is anticipated that some day "Faith" and "Charity," similarly represented, will make the group complete.

Colne. — The Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday week by the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, the afternoon subject being "Cease to do Evil: Learn to do Well," and that in the evening "Under Authority." There were large congregations, and the amount raised was above the average.

Dover.—On Tuesday evening a tea and public meeting were held in the church. The Rev. S. Burrows presided, and spoke on "What we have Done and what we can Do," urging the friends to be even more zealous and earnest than in the past. The Rev. T. Shakespeare gave an interesting account of his work amongst some religious inquirers at Deal. Mr. E. Chitty spoke on the need for some religious service on receiving new members. Mr. Dorrington Boyle urged the use of pictures in our churches, and Mr. W. Dawes gave a pleasant account of his visit, as a delegate, to the Provincial Assembly at Horsham. The proceedings were varied by music and songs, and the attendance was very good.

Liverpool: Hope-street Church.—A pleasant function took place in the Church Hall on the afternoon of Nov. 25, being the last Sunday of the Rev. A. Cobden Smith's period of work in Liverpool, where he has for eighteen months' been acting as assistant to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. Mr. Smith addressed the assembled Sunday scholars, urging them to work for the prosperity of the school, so that by their efforts it may advance in usefulness. Then Miss M. Haydon, for the elder girls, and Mr. R. Woodhead, for the elder boys, briefly expressed their appreciation of Mr. Smith's work amongst them, his ready help to all the societies, and his interest in the welfare of each individual member. They deeply regretted his departure. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong then presented Mr. Smith with a handsome study chair, from the scholars (especially the class of elder boys), the teachers, and a few other friends. Mr. Armstrong testified to Mr. Smith's good work, and wished him God speed in his new sphere.

London: Bermondsey.—After cleaning and redecoration the Bermondsey Church was reopened last Sunday evening. There was a very marked increase in the usual congregation, nearly 200 being present, the largest for some years, with the exception of the occasion of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's visit. The interior of the church has been greatly improved in appearance, the walls being coloured in green and white, and the fine ceiling picked out in cream. What with the new incandescent lighting, the red matting, and ferns and flowers, the whole effect was very cheerful and pleasing. Mr. E. Howard, who has charge of the work, gave an address from the words, "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." It was a good thing, Mr. Howard contended, for an individual or a church to disencumber itself of painful and unfortunate memories. The race of life, and especially spiritual strivings, taxed our powers to the utmost and recollections of some unfortunate part, while sometimes useful for present guidance, were often a great impediment in pressing towards the mark of our high calling. In this sense and for this purpose forgetting the things that are behind was a wise and necessary policy. An orchestral quartette, under the leadership of Miss Maud E. Aldis, greatly added to the attractiveness of the musical part of the service. A new feature was introduced on Sunday evening, and is to be continued every Sunday, in a sacred concert, held at the close of the service. On Monday evening the first of the popular entertainments was given, when about 200 people were present. Next Monday, Mr. Cressy S. Edmondson, who knows South Africa as few men do, will lecture on "Life in Rhodesia," illustrated by nearly 100 limelight views.

Middlesbrough.—On Nov. 18 Sunday-school anniversary services were held, the preacher being the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, who gave two eloquent addresses. The "Anniversary Service" by Miss Maud Turner was used, and was much enjoyed by scholars and congregation. The congregation in the evening was very good. On the following Wednesday the annual tea and entertainment took place, and proved to be the most successful gathering that there has been for many years. The programme included glees, by the church choir, and action songs, &c. A play, entitled Prince Bulbo, adapted from Thackeray's "Rose and the Ring," performed by some of the elder scholars, was much enjoyed. The programme closed with a "humorous sketch" by two members of the choir.

Monton.—The meeting on Saturday, Nov. 17, to welcome the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., as minister of Monton Church, briefly reported in our last issue, was very largely attended. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. G. H. Leigh, who was supported by the Revs. A. Bennett, S. A. Steinthal, and J. R. Bailey (of the Eccles Congregational Church); Messrs. John Dendy and W. E. Nansen (secretary). Among others present were the Revs. E. P. Barrow, P. Prime, G. Knight, W. E. George, Wilfred Harris, and W. R. Shanks, the Mayor of Eccles, Messrs. J. H. Brooks, Percy Leigh, H. S. Golland, and Councillor Clarke. Letters of regret for absence were received from the Rev. H. E. Dowson and other ministers in the Province, and from several Nonconformist ministers of other connections, several of whom bore testimony to the high esteem in which the Rev. P. M. Higginson was held by ministers and members of neighbouring churches. The Chairman offered a warm welcome to Mr. Bennett, and expressed their pleasure in having in Mr. Bailey so worthy a representative of the ministers of neighbouring churches present with them. Whatever differences of doctrine or method might separate them they were actuated by one common principle and desire to do what was possible in the direction of Christian work. He referred to the Bi-centenary of Monton Church, and the principle of freedom, so honourably maintained by Manchester College, at Oxford, on which their religious faith was founded. He recalled the long ministry of the Rev. R. Smethurst in the first half of the century, that of the Rev. T. E. Poynting, from whom many of them had learnt so much, in whose time the present church was built, and of his successor, the Rev. J. Harwood. Mr. Higginson for fifteen years had devoted himself entirely to the interests of the church and school, and it was a great sorrow to many of them to feel that his health no longer permitted him to continue. They all trusted that his journey to Egypt and Palestine might be the means of renewing his health, and that they might have many opportunities of seeing him amongst them again. Those ministers he had referred to had all been faithful men, and each in his own day had done what he could to build up the spiritual life of their church, and to lead up to what might be termed their present prosperous condition. The future of the ministry was entrusted to Mr. Bennett, and he was convinced it could be in no better hands. Mr. Bennett would maintain absolutely the traditions of their church. In him they would find a strong and devoted leader in every branch of their activity and interests. The church and school were absolutely one. He had been closely connected with both, and he was more than convinced that they could not be separated. He hoped there would be the same unity of spirit in the future in relation to the church and school life. Mr. John Dendy also welcomed Mr. Bennett, on behalf of the congregation. It was a momentous occasion, fraught with such great possibilities for both minister and people, and much must depend upon the tone and temper they assumed towards one another. There must be wide tolerance, for inevitably they would find points of opinion upon which they were not all agreed. There must be a generous charity on both sides, for which of them had not faults, and perhaps above all they must pray for the absence of that spirit of carping criticism and fault-finding which were the deadliest foes of all human relationships. Those were large demands to make, but if they were to succeed they would have to comply with them. Their thoughts turned to the church, not the beautiful edifice but the spiritual church, made by souls and not by hands, of which they were only temporary members. It had been for more than 200 years a centre of Christian work. They had a noble past, but vain would be their glory in it if it did not inspire them to a noble future. There had come down to them a noble inheritance, the right of not merely those who, like himself, had known no other spiritual home, but equally the right of all. It was an inheritance which brought with it responsibilities and duties which they might not shirk. They welcomed Mr. Bennett to a share of their sacred privileges and also to a share in their responsibilities. The chairman had rightly said that there was no division between church and school, and they were united in their welcome the better to emphasise their union in the bond of Christian brotherhood. Mr. Bennett's chief hope was in the young, and he could offer no better wish for the future than that he might be as successful and as good a teacher to the young of that church as Mr. Poynting had been to some of those present. They were looking to Mr. Bennett as guide and helper, but not merely in doctrinal instruction. Love was ever more than a creed. It would be by his example, sympathy, and steady incitement and encouragement that they might hope to obtain some day the vision of God, the peace that passeth understanding. They were justified in looking forward to the future with a glad confidence and bright hope. Reference had been made to the fact that they were on terms of brotherly goodwill and kindly regard with all their neighbours and churches. It was one of the most hopeful signs that never had there been such a time of friendly and neighbourly goodwill in the churches around them. They rejoiced in it, and let them not forget that it was to the personality and work of their late minister they owed that position. He concluded with earnest words of sympathy and welcome to Mr. Bennett, and the prayer that the blessing of God might rest upon their union. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, on behalf of the ministers of the Manchester District, joined heartily in the welcome, and was followed by the Rev. J. R. Bailey, who, in a very cordial speech, said that though he had no mandate from his brother ministers of that district, he knew that he could speak for them in joining as he did in that welcome. The brothers of the ministers' fraternal, of which he had the honour to be first president, and their late minister, Mr. Higginson, the second, would give Mr. Bennett the heartiest welcome to Eccles and the circle to which they belonged. Of that circle Mr. Cremer, Vicar of Eccles, was an esteemed member. Mr. Bailey, after humorous references to his own association with Unitarians, spoke of the debt the Evangelical churches owed to Unitarians in bringing out the truth of the humanity of Christ, and modifying views of the atonement and of the right interpretation of the Bible. He concluded by offering to Mr. Bennett a hearty welcome and Godspeed. The Rev. A. Bennett, in responding, said that he felt very deeply the warmth of their welcome and the responsibilities on which he was entering. The central aim before him in his ministry was best expressed in the words of the Archbishop of Canterbury when he accepted the Primacy—namely, to make it easier for Christians to become better Christians, to make it easier for those who were not Christians to become Christians. The aims of the Primate were the aims of the minister of Monton Church. He thanked Mr. Steinthal and Mr. Bailey for the heartiness of their welcomes. Mr. Bailey and he were acting in different regiments, but they were soldiers of one army marching in one direction, and they owed allegiance to one common Lord. He gave them a word of warning. They must not expect too much in the early days. Like a plant taken from its soil they must find that after his six years in Chesterfield some of the good Chesterfield earth would be found clinging to his roots. They would think none the worse of him on that account. He knew well enough that he would find the Monton earth as warm and kindly and conducive to growth as the place he had left. He did not doubt that one in sympathy and one in aim they might produce fruits which would be worthy to present before their Father. A short musical programme having been rendered by the choir, the hymn "Through the night of doubt and sorrow" brought the proceedings to a close.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—Last Sunday the Rev. W. Lindsay made reference to the late Sir Arthur Sullivan, and recalled the fact that years ago he had given permission for a performance of Pinafore, in aid of the school funds.

Reading.—The annual sale of work was held on 21st inst. There was a large attendance, and the sales were very satisfactory.

South Shields.—The special effort which the congregation are making for the placing of a resident minister here has been well responded to, and, thanks to the kind assistance of friends at Newcastle-on-Tyne and elsewhere, about £75 per annum has been promised towards the £100 required. It is hoped that by the end of the year the full amount will have been covered, and the committee are making arrangements for Mr. Paxton to commence his duties with the New Year. The church membership is being gradually increased, and the attendances are better than they have been for some years past. During the week lantern lectures and classes for the children are held, and everything points to the New Year commencing a new life in the history of the church.

GOD never would have called me to enter into a higher life if He had placed me in circumstances where it was impossible. —Phillips Brooks.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE new Parliament, the fifteenth of the Queen's reign, was opened on Monday, and Mr. Gully was elected for the third time Speaker of the House of Commons. The immediate business of the House is to vote additional war supplies, all the other business remaining to be dealt with in the new year; but occasion will doubtless be found to throw some light on the present position of the miserable conflict in South Africa, and the painful rumours which have been circulated as to the recent conduct of the war.

ALL things considered, it is a matter for congratulation that the London School Board has retained a Progressive majority, though a smaller one than before. The result of the voting gives 28 Progressives, 25 Moderates, and two Roman Catholics on the new Board. This will enable the Progressives, if they diligently attend to their duties, to control the committees and the Board; and, as several of the Moderates are really "moderate," there is no serious risk of any attempt being made to re-open the religious question. There was very great apathy at the election, and only a small number of people took the trouble to go to the poll. Unfortunately, this led to the defeat of three excellent members of the late Board—Miss McKee, Mr. Shepheard, and Mr. Warmington. We are glad that such steadfast friends of education and religious freedom as Miss Eve, Miss Homan, Mrs. Maitland, Miss Morton, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Macdonald, Lord Morpeth, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Stanley, and Mr. Wallas were elected. We may look forward to three years of quiet steady educational work.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE has been obliged by prudence, which all his friends will warmly approve, to abandon his lectures at University College for the present year. Though continuing to make good progress, and capable of facing the risk of lecturing on Thursday, Mr. Brooke's doctor and the lectureship committee were of one mind in counselling postponement, and he has therefore determined to rest until after Christmas, and promises the eight remaining lectures early in the new year, beginning probably the third week in January. When the exact date is fixed it will be duly announced.

THE Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union are organising a Forward Movement to cover the whole of their great district. Their special aims are to draw more closely together the bonds of inter-congregational fellowship, to establish more firmly and endow with new power and life the existing churches, and to discover and use a simpler and more winsome way of setting forth the religious value of our common faith. They will begin the new century with a great united service of self-consecration, to be held in Mill-hill Chapel. It will be followed by a lunch and then by a Conference, to which definite proposals, now being prepared by a sub-committee, will be submitted. These will probably include the appointment of a minister-at-large for the Yorkshire district; the adoption of a church record in common; the provision of new opportunities for intercourse between distant congregations; and a simultaneous mission, for the sanctifying and strengthening of the churches, in the early part of March, 1901.

WE reported a fortnight ago the hearty welcome given to the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams at Bankipore. On Oct. 26 he delivered his lecture on "Science and God" in the Government College hall to an audience of over 300, Mr. Havilland Le Mesurier, District Magistrate, in the chair. On Oct. 27 he gave his lecture on "Thomas Carlyle" in the same college hall. The hall was crowded with an audience of more than 400, which represented all the cultured classes of the community, both European and native. Mr. G. W. Place, District Judge, presided. A hearty vote of thanks was given to the lecturer on the motion of Babu Purendu Narayan Singh, M.A., Government Pleader. On Oct. 28 Mr. Williams visited the Bidhan Ashram (Student's Boarding House) of the New Dispensation Church, and addressed a few words to the Theological Class, and other students who were present. On Oct. 29 he conducted divine service, and preached a sermon on "The Unknown and the Known God" to a good congregation in the Ram Mohun Roy Seminary. On Oct. 30 he visited the Brahmo Girls' School, the Ram Mohun Roy School, the Boarding House connected with it, and the Sadhan Asram, an institution under the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, Calcutta. The men and women who have joined it as its workers have left their secular employments in order to devote themselves entirely to the propagation of theism. In the evening of the same day a social gathering was held at the Bungalow of Babu Brahma Deonarayan, the grounds of which were illuminated for the occasion. There were present Brahmos, Hindus, and Mahommedans. Several interesting questions in theology were discussed. On Oct. 31 Mr. Williams delivered a lecture on "The Origin, Nature, and Destiny of Man" in the Behar National College hall. Mr. R. L. Hare, Commissioner of the Division, presided over a crowded audience of 350. These engagements completed the tour, and Mr. Williams returned to Calcutta.

THE Sunday School Association has once more issued a valuable catalogue of books suitable for young people, and for libraries and prizes. The books are grouped according to price, and distinguished as suitable for children under and over twelve years of age. At the same time the new volume of The Helper is announced, edited this year by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and offering a rich store, of which we shall shortly have an opportunity of saying more. Young Days, edited by the Rev. J. J. Wright, also promises excellently for the new year.

THERE seems no limit to Dr. Robertson Nicoll's successful energy. His newest undertaking The British Monthly is in the same form as the Bookman, but is much more profusely illustrated. It is to be "An Illustrated Record of Religious Life and Work." With the first (December) number, there is a special illustrated supplement with descriptive articles by Dr. Parker, the Rev. Hugh Black, and the Editor, on "The Union of the Scottish Churches." One of the chief articles in the body of the magazine tells of Dr. Alexander McLaren and his Union Chapel at Manchester, opening with a fine portrait of the old man. Near the end poor Mary E. Wilkins has a short story, "An Old Arithmetician," sadly mixed up with somebody's "Blood Mixture," somebody else's cure for "All Fat People," a Novel Prize Competition, and other delectable things. Of course it pays, but it sets one's teeth on edge.

SHORT NOTICES.

Jesus of Nazareth: Lessons of his Life, Death, and Resurrection learnt at Ober-Ammergau, by Charles Hargrove, M.A., consists of four sermons preached in Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds, after witnessing the Passion Play in August. "The Immortal Christ," "The Man Christ," "The Suffering Christ," and "The Rising Christ," are the subjects of the four sermons, in which the impressiveness of the representation and the lessons of the play are well brought out. The first lesson Mr. Hargrove brings back from Ober-Ammergau, seeing there men of every creed, gathered from a divided Christendom, all deeply impressed by the one spectacle, is that Christ lives and reigns and conquers, "the great moral force in the world." The next strong impression was that while witnessing the play, they were all Unitarians, so clearly human was the Christ; and Mr. Hargrove adds in a note:—

"If I saw it often I should cease to believe in the Divinity of Christ," said a clergyman to a friend of mine, as he came out of the theatre. Yes, if Christians came to realise the story of Jesus of Nazareth, how he lived and preached and died, they would surely cease to believe him God, perhaps would begin to accept his Gospel of the Kingdom.

"The Suffering Christ" tells the same story, showing the attractiveness of the Cross as the way of eternal life. The resurrection scene Mr. Hargrove found in harsh contrast with the rest of the story, even as the narratives in the Gospels are, if taken literaliy. The lesson is that the visions of the Risen Christ must be interpreted spiritually:—

It is not from the ordinary to the marvellous, from sad scenes of every day to scenes of wonder which never were beheld of men before or since, that the transition is made. It is from the seen to the unseen, from the world of sense to the world of spirit, from the scenes in which Caiaphas, and Pilate and Judas, and Jesus, and John, and the mob, all alike, holy and profane, take their part, to scenes in which no part is possible except to believers. For after the resurrection Jesus is seen of none but his own disciples, this by itself a fact which shows that he was not seen in the body; it was soul, not sight, which discerned him, he was seen only of those who believed.

And so he still is seen of us, and leads those who enter into his spirit and feel its power to his God and our God, our Father in heaven. The little book is in the same dainty form as Mr. Stopford Brooke's lectures on "Religion in Literature and Life." (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, W.C. 1s. net.)

IN addition to his "History of Upper Chapel," Sheffield, the Rev. J. E. Manning has published two most interesting historical pamphlets, (i.) The Wise Virgin: being an account of the Book of this name written by the Rev. James Fisher, vicar of Sheffield, with a portrait from the edition of 1664, giving an account of the vicar's niece, Martha Hatfeild, a child of twelve, who for the greater part of 1652, lay in a helpless state, suffering from some form of hysteria, and under the influence of convulsive fits poured out pious utterances, which were taken down as divinely inspired. It is a very curious memorial of a bygone age. (ii.) A Good Puritan Woman: Pages from the Diary of Mrs. Timothy Jollie, of Sheffield, the brave wife of the first minister of Upper Chapel, and daughter of the above-named Rev. James Fisher. This is a still more interesting narrative, from the days of the persecution of Nonconformists, telling of how Mrs. Jollie went to her husband, imprisoned in York Castle, and much else, written in quaint letters to her children, with abundant good advice. Thus she says to her daughter:—

Be not hasty to believe all thou hears without very good ground for it.

Meddle not needlessly with other people's matters. Take heed of being a busybody.

Take heed of telling stories of others. The Lord hath let me see a great evil in this.

Try them thou conversest with before thou trust them.

If thou live to be capable to give advice, be sure thou weigh the matter well, and hear all circumstances before thou give thy thoughts.

Mrs. Jollie died Jan. 17, 1708-9, and was buried in the Upper Chapel-yard. (Sheffield. The Independent Press. 6d. each. These two pamphlets as well as the "History of Upper Chapel" are now to be had at Essex Hall).

The Speaker's Chair: Its origin, the procedures historically associated with it, and biographical sketches of its most notable occupants, by Edward Lummis, is a picturesque and most interesting essay, tracing the development of that great Parliamentary personage, Mr. Speaker, from his first appearance in Edward III.'s reign, to the advent of the present Speaker, whose portrait furnishes a dignified frontispiece to the volume. At the end is a list of the Speakers with dates and other particulars. Mr. Lummis is well known to our readers, most recently by his admirable articles on the Church of England. He is now on the list of Oxford University Extension lecturers, and if should one doubt his gifts as an eloquent and capable historical lecturer, let them procure this little book. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d.).

The People of China: Their Country, History, Life, Ideas, and Relations with the Foreigner, by J. W. Robertson-Scott, is a work of careful compilation, which compresses into small space a great amount of information. The author has not himself been in China, but he uses with great success the writings of those who have such first hand knowledge, and if he does not escape all errors, he has produced an interesting and serviceable book. There is a capital large-size map of China. (Methuen and Company. 3s. 6d.)

The Life of a Century, edited by Edwin Hodder, is to be completed in twelve sixpenny parts. It is profusely illustrated, and the first two parts are enough to show that it will present a vivid and interesting picture of English history during the century. It opens with a picture of the social state of England in 1801. A subsequent chapter deals with religious progress. (George Newnes, Ltd.)

Studies of the Soul, by J. Brierley, B.A. (second edition), is a collection of "J. B.'s" thoughtful and always welcome contributions to the Christian World, published two years ago, and noticed at the time in these columns. There are thirty-seven prose studies, and at the end some verses, "Christmas Voices: 1894," of which the following is the conclusion:—

Say'st thou that Christ's in tomb,
And that He from its gloom
Broke forth is only fond disciples' dream?
Not so, for myriad lives
In whom His spirit strives
Proclaim His risen, deathless power in them.
Ring, then, the Christmas bells!
'Tis only husks and shells
Of man's best life that crushed and broken lie;
The Essence still is here,
And all that love holds dear,
While "God with us" unites the earth and sky.

It has been interesting to notice that "J. B.'s" Christian World articles are frequently reprinted by our Indian contemporaries, and we are by no means surprised that a second edition of his book is called for. (James Clarke and Co. 3s. 6d.)

This year's volume of the Sunday Magazine is enriched by a series of seven papers by Dr. John Watson on "Children of the Resurrection," and twelve literary studies by the Bishop of Ripon, entitled "The Religious Element in the Poets," including Shakespeare, Milton, Coleridge, Spenser, Marlowe, Browning, and Tennyson. (Isbister and Co. 7s. 6d.)

Good Words is interesting as ever, and has some charming full-page illustrations. The story running through the year is "The Half-Hearted," by John Buchanan. (Isbister and Co. 7s. 6d.)

The Rosebud Annual furnishes again its carnival of amusing pussy-cats and other animals, while dolls, goblins, and little fairies play their part among the children. But the volume is not exclusively comic. There are some songs and puzzles, and other things. (James Clarke and Co. 4s.)

RELIGION IN ENGLAND DURING THE CENTURY.

IX.

METHODISM.

THE history of Methodism in the nineteenth century, when the twentieth century shall have advanced far enough to make such a history possible, will be an interesting and instructive story. It will tell of many difficulties overcome, of many disturbances quelled, of much continuous and successful work, in the course of which has been evolved a great ecclesiastical system as complete in its details as it is manifestly durable. The question pressing upon the minds of many earnest Methodists, and of hundreds who, not being Methodists, have many Methodistic affinities and the heartiest goodwill to the Methodist Churches, is this: Will the history be an encouraging and gladsome narrative like that earlier one which tells of the education of the brothers Wesley; of their attempts at reformation at Oxford; of John Wesley's "conversion," and of the various influences that affected his spiritual growth; of the wonderful results of the preaching of Whitefield and the Wesleys; of the saintly life of the "nominated successor" of Wesley, Fletcher of Madeley, who died long before his leader; of the sending forth of lay-preachers, of the formation of Methodist Societies, and the beginnings of the Class Meeting; of John Wesley's determination to be loyal to the Church and not to form "a sect;" of the great care that he took, meanwhile, to watch over the growth of that plant of his, which was fast becoming a great sectarian tree, nearly related to, but quite distinct from the venerable trunk upon which its seed grew?

When John Wesley died in 1791 the more important institutions of Methodism had been already founded. Societies existed up and down the country; annual conferences were already held; the doctrines of Methodism were already determined; Wesley's practical good-sense (and his domineering tendencies one may add, for the breach with the Moravians was partly a question of personal precedence) had set him free from Moravian mysticism; the question of Predestination versus Free Will had caused much trouble and controversy in past days; but Wesley's Arminianism brightly expounded as it was by Fletcher, and put into popular verse by Charles Wesley had conquered. Foreign missions were already successfully established. And by the beginning of this century there must have been already a total of more than 100,000 members of Methodist Societies.

Separate from the Church.

It very soon appeared after Wesley's death that the "people called Methodists" did not really belong to the Church of England, and that the pretence would have to be given up. Wesley as long as he could, and as widely as he could, had prevailed on the members to attend the church for the sacraments, and for the ordinary services if the minister was godly and preached sound doctrine. But practically this was to be a matter of personal taste and personal judgment. And those who met together in Methodist Societies, who sang the enthusiastic Methodist hymns together, and related their spiritual experiences to each other, and worked together for the conversion of sinners, were bound together by a bond much closer than that which connected them with the parish church; where it was very possible they might hear on any Sunday, when they happened to attend, a sermon pointing at them as schismatics, or satirising them as the victims of self-conceit. Wesley, himself, had found it necessary to take upon him the functions of a Bishop, to ordain men not only to preach the Gospel but to administer the sacraments. However he might disguise the matter to himself, this was an act of separation. It was taking upon himself to do that which did not belong to him as a clergyman of the Establishment, and which had no other authority than the personal will (the Divinely directed will, let us say) of John Wesley. The logical consequence was resisted as long as possible, even after Wesley's death; but after much struggle the question could have but one ending; the "Plan of Pacification" was really a plan for introducing as easily as possible the change from dependence upon the Church of England to dependence on the Conference, and the ministers by it appointed for the administration of the sacraments.

The Methodist New Connexion.

It is not at all surprising to learn that Alexander Kilham, one of the ministers who had most clearly seen and most readily accepted the inevitable, was the man who shortly after, in 1796, was expelled from the ministry. There was a resolute will in this man, joined with practical common-sense not at all unbecoming in a follower of Wesley. He rebelled against the Conservative tendencies of the Conference, and when sent adrift he founded the Methodist New Connexion, working on lines similar to those taken by the Wesleyan body, preaching the same doctrines, organising in the same way but allowing much greater power to the laity—an advance which in more recent years the older body has learned to respect and in some degree to imitate. The schism was the cause of much bitter feeling, but the sore has long been healed. The Wesleyan body and the New Connexion know how to respect each other, and differing in their interpretations of certain episodes of the past, have similar aims and hopes for the present and the future.

The Primitive Methodists.

A word may be said here of the Primitive Methodists who for a long time, if not up to the present hour, really represented the enthusiastic, missionising, joyous spirit of the original founders of Methodism better than did the parent body. The founder was Hugh Bourne, an earnest and able preacher, writer also of some indifferent hymns.

He introduced from America the exceedingly popular and effective, if somewhat risky, institution of the Camp Meeting—a series of open-air preachings, singing, prayers, confessions, &c., continued from early morn till late in the evening. For his persistence in carrying on these meetings, after they had been officially discouraged, Hugh Bourne was expelled from the Methodist Society in 1808. He kept on with his work, and gradually the Primitive Methodist Society was founded; the constitution of which again was even more democratic than that of the Methodist New Connexion. Before Bourne's death there were 110,000 members, and 5,300 chapels. John Wesley not only founded a sect, he taught others how it might be done.

Other Methodist Bodies.

It is not possible to go into the details of the origin of the other minor Methodist bodies. The Bible Christians were gathered together by the labours of William O'Bryan, in Devon and Cornwall. He had been a Wesleyan local preacher, but being excluded from the Connexion, he laboured so successfully on his own account, that he found that he had in fact become the head of a new organisation. The two counties in which the movement originated are still the chief home of the denomination, though its activities have spread far and wide. The United Methodist Free Churches are an amalgamation of two bodies of Methodists, both of which had independently arisen by revolts from the officers and the officialism of the original body.

It may be said as a general rule that whenever there has been a revolt within the borders of Wesleyan Methodism it has not been a question of doctrine, but of rule and organisation. It may simplify matters and not cause any great misunderstanding to say that the Reformers and Schismatics were the Chartists of Methodism, claiming greater power and more direct representation for the people. Meanwhile in the Wesleyan body itself, freedom is slowly broadening down from precedent to precedent.

All the minor Methodist bodies have preserved the distinctive doctrines of the Wesleys. John Wesley once explained that the difference between Methodists and Dissenters was that the latter found fault with the Church and its representative ministers, while the Methodist preachers found fault with their hearers and endeavoured to convince them of sin. The tradition has been well kept. The Methodists of every school appeal to men as sinners; they teach the way of Salvation by Faith; like Charles Wesley they are aggressively Arminian and love to preach or to sing of God's undistinguishing Grace; they have all had that which John Wesley considered to be the Holy Spirit's seal—namely, a considerable amount of success in the conversion of souls.

The Immense Growth of Methodism.

And to-day, however we may read the history of the past, the vast importance of the phenomenon of Methodism cannot be denied or ignored. The Wesleyans alone have in Great Britain 2,200 ministers, 7,300 Sunday-schools, 967,000 scholars, and 481,000 church members. The minor Methodist bodies have 2,400 ministers, 843,000 Sunday-scholars, and 379,500 members. When we add to these the missionaries and members in foreign lands; when we think of the enormous sums of money raised yearly for Foreign Missions and the support of Home Institutions; when we think of the Methodist colleges and schools, children's homes, orphanages, temperance societies, and the almost innumerable means that the Methodists possess for affecting the lives of men; when we hear enthusiastic Methodists claim that there are thirty millions of people under Methodistic training and influence; without waiting for the means of verifying the statement we can see that the problem of the future of Methodism is of vast and almost incalculable importance. The Methodists might well say, in the words of Dr. Martineau's beautiful prayer, "Thou hast stretched out our branches over the sea, and laid upon us a mighty trust."

Progress of Thought.

One would like to be able to read the signs of the times, and to say what makes for the strength and for the weakness of Methodism. It should be reckoned to the advantage of the Methodists that they have known how to keep pace with the progress of the age in regard to education. The Methodist preacher of to-day, whether itinerant or local, is better taught than his predecessor a generation ago. The average Methodist member is more widely read, has a broader outlook, is not so exclusively interested in the domestic troubles or successes of his own denomination. A striking illustration of progress in this direction is this year's or last year's Wesleyan Methodist Magazine compared with a volume, say, thirty years old. They seem hardly to belong to the same world. For another illustration take Dr. Osborne's Fernley Lecture (1870) and compare it with some of the best of recent lectures delivered on the same foundation—say, with W. T. Davison's on "Conscience," or G. G. Findlay's on "Christianity and Morals." The later lectures are in the strictest sense of the word studies, grappling with earnest problems in the light of modern thought as well as the light of the Bible and the Evangelical tradition. Dr. Osborne's lecture on the "Holy Spirit," with its childish applications of Old Testament texts, and its utter lack of deep thought, might have been written in an age when Biblical science was unknown and inconceivable.

With what Result?

But this mental progress points to one of the dangers of Methodism. It is learning to re-state its doctrines, as it has known how to revise and supplement its hymn-books. But the question comes: How far can this process be carried without destroying Methodism itself? To take one single point. The doctrine of Original Sin, as understood by Wesley and Fletcher, has now become incredible. The "invocation of sinners" has in consequence lost much of its force. But if the doctrine be modified, and shifted to a secondary position; if it be so stated as not to clash with the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God understood in the broadest and deepest sense, will not Methodism become Universalistic and—cease to be Methodism? Every reader of modern Methodism will know that the suggestion is not unfounded.

The Money Danger.

This danger is not of the kind that the readers of this paper would take sadly to heart. But we cannot afford to be indifferent to another danger, that Methodism may become secularised, that is to say that it may be marred by worldliness. A new Wesleyan paper declares that if the Million Guinea scheme fail it will be a confession of the impotence of Methodism before the whole world. Will it indeed? Then, alas, for Methodism! Of all people in the world John Wesley would suppose that his followers would be the last to adopt the "Make a thousand a year or hang yourself" principle. If the scheme had been to save a million souls, at any expense of guineas and prayers and good works that might be required; or to awaken a million regrets for the deeds of the criminal year 1900; or to get a million strong and sober men to swear solemnly that they would devote their lives to the discouragement of covetousness, national and personal, and the quenching of the military spirit—then, to fail in that great moral project might be humiliating. But what Word of God, ancient or modern, will be fulfilled when the Methodists have raised a million guineas? Methodism is doing a great work yet in the world. May Heaven preserve it, and so purge it that it may bring forth more fruit. Much of its wealth is wisely used. On this very day as I write I see in the morning paper a letter from Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., to a faithful Wesleyan worker in Manchester:—

> As I read the summary of your evangelistic and social work, I am reminded of early Methodism and that indomitable Christian reformer, who in season and out of season was a true servant of the masses of the people—Wesley. A mission which not only numbers 5,000 on its church roll, but in one year has helped 3,347 persons to employment, and met 3,934 women at the prison gates, is surely the work of God. I send £105 towards your work, and very sincerely wish you and your fellow-workers, known and unknown, God-speed.

This letter alone would furnish proof to any one who needs it, that in the year 1900 Wesleyan Methodism is doing faithful work, and that many of its talents and much of its wealth are admirably used. But the power of raising vast sums of money, such as is implied in the very conception of the Million Guinea scheme, is in itself a danger. Our national record before God and before the nations of Europe would be cleaner than it is if our Government for the last few years had not raised its revenues so easily. And Methodism will need all the prayers and all the best endeavours of its best men if it is to use its great resources, not chiefly for the strengthening of an organisation and the glory of spiritual empire, but for the souls of men.

It is said that at the present time those who have the welfare of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at heart are anxious for the future of the pulpit. Students sufficient in number, in character, and in energy to give assurance of success hardly seem to be coming forward. A disproportioned leakage in lay-membership has long been deplored.

These are spiritual ailments which the mere increase of wealth and strengthening of machinery will not touch. John Wesley converted men and women by reminding them that they had souls to save. It is a reminder yet needed for Methodists—and others. May Heaven send the right man to give it voice. James Ruddle.

A Further Correction.—A Correspondent informs us in regard to Dewsbury, mentioned in Mr. Hargrove's recent Provincial Letter, that it was not Mr. Broadbent, but Mr. Broadrick, who was minister at Unity Church. Further, that Mr. Howe's ministry was quite as long as Mr. Constable's, and Mr. Smith's longer still.

LITERATURE.

PRIESTHOOD AND SACRIFICE.*

This is the printed report of a conference of clergy and ministers, held last year at Oxford, and one's impression on closing the book is of having been for a time in the privileged society of a group of fine minds, all engaged in discussing questions of great moment in religion. One parts from them almost with a sense of that curious sadness which invariably accompanies the breaking-up of any goodly conference of devout men. The members, fifteen in all, seem to have been chosen with great care by the originator and convener of the meeting, Dr. Sanday. They may be divided into three sets, five of whom represent the advanced High Church movement, five the more liberal wing of the Anglican Church, and five Evangelical Nonconformity—the nominal basis for all in the Conference being the Old and New Testaments, accepted in a very literal sense of inspiration. However far from all of them we ourselves may be in doctrines—indeed, almost from the very moulds of their thought and expression—we cannot but rejoice to see this drawing together of theologians in council, not to settle "the truth" by majorities, but to seek for grounds of a far wider inclusion and more general agreement.

Not the least pleasurable effect of the book is its revelation of the differing characteristics of the members. To some, indeed, it may be solely of interest as a psychological study. These earnest theologians are self-revealing. At the head sits Dr. Sanday, an embodiment of calm deliberation, fitted to preside at such a meeting, for he boasts of his desire to see both the good and bad elements of an idea, without condemning or fully commending the idea itself (p. 86), frankly acknowledging elsewhere that he "is feeling his way to new ground," saying, at another time, "I am arguing, not with others, but only with myself," and towards the end of the third discussion—"There again I face both ways." Against this suavity how the vigorous decision of Canon Gore stands out, the impersonation of his own ideas, or Dr. Forsyth, the representative of the newer dogmatism of Nonconformity. Then there is the tenderness of nature and sympathy that shows itself in the poetic phrases of Dr. Moberley, a foil of light against the Pauline energy and argumentativeness of Dr. Fairbairn. And while the liberal Churchman will glory in the almost physical impression of Archdeacon Wilson's independence and manliness, there will be few Dissenters who will not be the prouder in their Dissent for the noble form of it revealed in Mr. Arnold Thomas, of Bristol, who, in one place, touches the weakness of many a church in saying: "Is it not possible, in laying so much stress on the relation of the individual to the society, to be too little mindful of the personal relation of the soul to God."

Turning from the members to their work in the Conference, it is, of course, needful to speak first of two limitations that will soon strike the general reader. One is owing to the nature of the book—and that is the difficulty arising from the sudden break in thought that comes with each speaker—though the compensation lies in its inducement to the mind to keep alert. Even more trying will many find the technicality of the phrases, the language of the theological schools that may seem to require at times some special kind of dictionary. This was to be expected when each speaker, as the son of some particular church, brings with him phrases and words whose full meaning must often be lost upon others for want of that atmosphere in which he was trained. A mere glance at the Preliminary Questions will be hard enough reading for some.

But for those to whom the questions of Priesthood (whether of the individual, or of the whole Church), and of Sacrifice (with its manifold meanings) are of interest, to them this book will prove intensely attractive. They will find three lines of thought developed on the subject of Sacrifice, and two on that of Priesthood. There are members of the Conference whose idea of Sacrifice is practically limited to that of the death of Christ: in that stupendous act they find all sacrifice realised: and to that day on Calvary their eyes for ever return. Resolutely against this concentration upon the past are those High Churchmen who look upon their Lord's death but as the "inaugural act" of the perpetual sacrifice. For them he is daily offered anew in "the sacrifice of the altar." The whole of the earlier part of the Mass (as clearly enough seen, not only in Western liturgies but in the far older Eastern liturgies, to be the thing of prime importance in Roman and Greek Catholicism)—the Oblation—this is the central thought of this second group of thinkers. But quite as determined are the men of the third school, who are neither wholly satisfied with the all-sufficiency of Calvary, nor at all in sympathy with exalting the Sacrificial at the expense of the Communion element in worship. These look upon sacrifice for the Christian as purely a spiritual and moral self-oblation, "the perpetual consecration of life in obedience to the spirit of Christ," as Archdeacon Wilson says, or, in Mr. Arnold Thomas's words: "The sacrifices we may offer are those sacrifices only that belong to a spiritual dispensation—namely, the sacrifice of a consecrated will, of the love of a loyal heart, and the devotion of the whole life."

The discussions on the priesthood have the clear division one might expect. Dr. Fairbairn, as representative of those who dislike the very term, persistently reminds the Conference that in the three lists of Church members given by St. Paul, neither the term, nor the work, of the priest is alluded to. Although the reiteration of this rouses one High Churchman to the only fiery note of the Conference, the same speaker shows a strange eagerness to emphasise the priesthood of the whole Church. On this point both Nonconformists and Churchmen found themselves well in accord, only drifting apart again when Dr. Moberly ventured his definition of the ordained priest as a "ministering organ of the Church's priesthood."

Some refreshingly human notes occur in the midst of this nineteenth-century scholasticism, as when someone quotes Irenæus to Dr. Fairbairn, and the Fathers are brushed aside by—"I have nothing to do with Irenæus. I am dealing with Dr. Moberly"; or, again, when the sacrifice of Christ is spoken of as being continued eternally in heaven, Dr. Davison admits a limitation even to Anglican Gnosticism—"I doubt whether we can build much upon our Lord's priestly work in heaven, because we know so little about it."

The book is undoubtedly one to be read, not only by those who are in search of suggestive thoughts, or who would be fascinated by the self-revelation of notable personalities, but by all who desire evidence of that growing love of unity (not uniformity) which is the note of the larger life in religion. All these will be very grateful to Dr. Sanday, both for summoning the Conference and for sending out this record of it.

LITURGICAL SERVICES.*

The desire for some liturgical form of service for public worship in our churches has of recent years found expression in a number of books. The well-known "Ten Services" prepared by Dr. Sadler and Dr. Martineau have long been in familiar use. The "Book of Prayer, in Thirty Orders of Worship," edited by the late R. Crompton Jones, in which the forms are for the opening part of the service only, leaving greater freedom to the minister, if not so widely adopted in habitual use, has been invaluable in setting a high standard of devotional utterance, and in helping later compilers. Other liturgies have been prepared for the use of particular congregations, as at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and Cairo-street, Warrington. Two years ago we welcomed the "Six Orders of United Worship," prepared by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Birmingham, and quite recently, a revised edition of a "Book of Common Prayer," based on the Church of England service, by the Rev. E. I. Fripp.

But still congregations ask for some other book, and it is in the hope of meeting their need that the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie has prepared the "Seven Services," [1] now published by Mr. Philip Green. Printed in large type, in convenient form, and published at a very moderate price, this book has already been adopted by more than one congregation, and will doubtless quickly make its way to a wider acceptance. Habitual use is the only real test of the worth of a liturgy; but these services are compiled for the most part from familiar material, and with good judgment; they are simple in form, proceeding in a regular order, and our first impression is that a congregation would find in them the satisfaction of a true and full devotional utterance. The Preface notes a number of sources from which material has been taken, ranging from the "Book of Common Prayer," to Dr. John Hunter's "Devotional Services," and the "Book of Five Services for Public Worship," published some years ago by the American Unitarian Association. From this last, not only an adaptation of one of the services is taken, but three beautiful introductory services for Christmas, Easter and Commemoration of the Departed. One thing we are sorry to miss in these "Seven Services," and that is some of the best known collects of the English Prayer-Book, "Lord of all power and might," "O God, protector of all who trust in Thee," "O God, from whom all holy desires," "O God who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth," and some others. Mr. Bowie suggests, it is true, the use of a collect before the sermon, but he does not print them in his book, and we confess that no such services seem to us complete, if they do not include these most beautiful and most universal utterances of English devotion. We have only noticed one misprint, on p. 33, where in the third line from the bottom an are has dropped out. Mr. Bowie's "Handbook for Ministers," with special services, has been already noticed in these columns. It is uniform in size, and will be a useful companion to these "Seven Services."

We may take this opportunity of calling the attention of our readers to two other service-books. The "Five Orders of Prayer" [2], compiled by the Rev. J. H. Green, has been adopted by his congregation at Lydgate. Chants and Canticles are not printed in the Services, leaving a greater latitude of selection. One interesting feature in the Fourth Service is the arrangement as a responsive prayer of the well-known chapter in the Imitatio Christi (III. 2) on "Truth teaching inwardly." One error of taste we feel bound to point out in this book—the marking by foot-note in the services themselves the authorship of certain prayers. Surely all such references should be confined to the Preface.

The "Services for Public Worship" [3], first printed in 1889 by the late Rev. Henry Bonner, for the use of his own congregation, and now published for wider use, should be consulted by all future workers in the same field. Mr. Bonner was a Baptist minister, broad-minded and devout, of fine feeling and judgment. In preparing his services he made considerable use of the "Ten Services" and Mr. Crompton Jones's book. The result has stood the test of use, and the book is now published with music added for the responses. In addition to morning and evening services for five Sundays and a Communion service, there are four children's services, and a collection of occasional prayers and collects.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The first volume of the sumptuous Monthly Review is completed with the December number, which is enriched by nine full-page illustrations of paintings in the Franciscan Church at Assisi and at Florence, adding greatly to the interest of Mr. R. E. Fry's article on "Giotto." Another attractive article is by Miss E. Siebel on "The Religion of Rabelais," in whose large and sunny nature there was no scorn.

Love—extended to our fellows—is to Rabelais, as to Browning and Kingsley, the only solution of human ills. If men would help one another, there would be "peace amongst mortals, love and delight, good faith, repose and feasting. No lawsuit, no war, no disputing." And without this large charity, intellect, which he so much valued, seemed to him worthless.

Mr. William Archer writes on "An Academy of the Dead," pointing out the necessary limitations of Westminster Abbey. But George Eliot was buried at Highgate, not at Kensal Green (p. 125). The thoughtful article of L. Villari on "International Ethics" should be read. The first editorial article on "A Possible Party" advocates a sober Imperialism.

In the Nineteenth Century we are glad to find an article by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar on "Present Day Progress in India," which is substantially the address he gave this summer at the Imperial Institute. Mr. Leslie Stephen writes with appreciative friendship of the late Professor Huxley, and Prince Kropotkin contributes one of his valuable articles on "Recent Science." But the article which we hope will be most widely read is by Mrs. J. R. Green on "A Visit to the Boer Prisoners at St. Helena," a pathetic picture at first-hand, bringing out in a convincing manner some of the nobler elements of Boer character.

There is many a true Englishman, who has reflected on the story of his own people, who, if he himself could see into the tents of the Boers, must feel grief and awe that sorrow of the quality there known should lie under the English flag. Truly the lessons of tragedy may be learned there; "to raise and afterwards to calm the passions, to purge the soul from pride, by the examples of human miseries, which befall the greatest—in few words, to expel arrogance and introduce compassion."

The Contemporary ends the century with a doleful article by Professor Goldwin Smith, on "Genesis and Outlook of Religion," though with the conviction at last that rational data must be found for a reconstruction of faith, since Man will not rest in blank Agnosticism. Mr. Andrew Lang writes pleasantly of Professor Max Müller. Mr. H. W. Massingham, in his article on "The Philosophy of a Saint," expounds Tolstoy; Mr. S. Gardiner, a master of the subject, with warm appreciation criticises Mr. John Morley's "Cromwell." Mr. W. Clarke prophesies of "The Social Future of England," in a manner to set a limit to our pride, and Mr. W. W. Peyton completes his thoughtful study of "The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation," bringing out the divine meaning of self-sacrifice.

The Fortnightly Review contains a strong indictment of the London County Council by Mr. C. S. Jones, on "The Housing Question," charging the Council with want of capacity, not of opportunity, in having failed to use their powers under Part III. of the Housing Act of 1890, for the erection of dwellings to take the place of insanitary property cleared away. Mr. W. H. Dawson's article on "Society's Duty to the Tramp" urges the need of more resolute and rational measures in dealing with vagrancy, and gives examples from Berlin and Berne of a better system of workhouse employment and discipline.

Lovers of Ruskin will find in the new Northern Counties Magazine an eloquent account by Canon Rawnsley of the unveiling of the Ruskin Memorial on Friar's Crag overlooking Derwentwater. Mr. George Smith's most interesting reminiscences in Cornhill are this month devoted to Charlotte Brontë.

MR. HARRY RAWSON, J.P.

OUR friend and contributor, Mr. Alderman Rawson, of Manchester, completed his eightieth year on 26th ult., and the occasion naturally called forth, in public and private, a host of congratulations, in which many of our readers will be glad to share. There is probably no one in our religious community who, for so long a time has taken such a prominent part in our various institutions. It would be impossible and, for the happiest of reasons, out of place, to enumerate all the societies which owe much to his wise counsel and generous support. Others there are, like the Sustentation Fund, which he was largely instrumental in founding. And yet these labours form only a part of his life of public service. The great body of Manchester people, who know little of Mr. Rawson in relation to our "household of faith," think of him as one of their foremost citizens ever to the front, especially in educational matters, a distinguished member of the City Council, who more than once has been pressed to accept the highest office of all—that of Lord Mayor. In recent years he has devoted especial attention to the City police, to whom considerable disrepute had attached.

Of Mr. Rawson's services in this connection, as Chairman of the Watch Committee, the Manchester Guardian spoke in the following terms:—

The task of restoring the old confidence of the public in the force was not by any means an enviable one, and at Mr. Rawson's age most men would have shrunk from undertaking it. But in spite of his years he applied himself to it, and he and his colleagues have now the satisfaction of knowing that the police force of the city never stood higher than it does to-day in the confidence of the public, and that that confidence was never better deserved.

On Thursday, the 29th ult., Mr. Rawson was entertained by the Watch Committee at luncheon in the Town Hall, the Lord Mayor presiding, when the following address, illuminated on vellum, was presented:—

To Harry Rawson, Esq., justice of the peace, and alderman of the city of Manchester, chairman of the Watch Committee, &c.

On the completion of your 80th year we, the undersigned, your colleagues on the Watch Committee of the city of Manchester, desire to convey to you the assurance of the esteem and veneration we feel towards you.

We offer our sincere congratulations upon the fact that the burden of years rests lightly upon you, and that advanced age is accompanied by so remarkable a degree of mental and physical vigour.

Throughout your long career you have given yourself to the service of your fellow-citizens with untiring energy and devotion.

Our desire is specially to express our appreciation of your labours in connection with the Watch Committee of this great city.

None know better than your colleagues that the success which has so largely attended the work has been mainly due to the energy, tact, and resourcefulness which you have brought to bear upon it.

We rejoice to bear testimony to the purity purpose and singleness of aim which in this as in all other spheres of labour has marked your public career. The one fitting reward, the only possible one, for such a life of service and devotion is to be found in the esteem and gratitude of your fellow-men.

In this tribute of our esteem and reverence we desire to associate along with your own name Mrs. Rawson, whose care and affection, we are sensible, has done so much to strengthen and encourage you in your manifold public duties.

The address was signed by the Lord Mayor of Manchester and the other members of the Committee.

Mr. Alderman King, in proposing the health of Mr. Rawson, said the members of the Committee and of the Council had the warmest feelings of admiration and respect for Mr. Rawson. Virtually, Mr. Rawson was the senior member, the "Father" of the Council. Nominally, he was not so, because of a short break in his service.

The address was then presented by the Lord Mayor.

Mr. Alderman Rawson, in acknowledging the presentation, said he regarded it has a great honour that he should be called upon to preside over a committee charged with duties of such critical importance. The Committee had had an arduous time during the last three years. He would say how entirely he reciprocated the kindly feelings towards him conveyed in the address. His public life had been prolonged through many years, and they had been years of great and uniform happiness. By an orderly and systematic apportionment of his time and work he had always been able to attend to his private affairs. To those who were deterred from the service of the public by the necessary allotment of attention he would only say that a man who would carefully keep a diary of his engagements might dismiss his fears. The prompt discharge of every duty as it arose was the true economy of labour. He attributed the customary good health he had enjoyed to a daily demand for attention to duties that were, first important, and then of a varied character. Sometimes it had of late years been suggested to him that he should surrender all but his private solicitudes, but he had sympathised with the sentiment that Tennyson put in the mouth of Ulysses—

> How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
> To rust unburnish'd, not to shine in use!
> As tho' to breathe were life.

So long as health was spared to him he hoped to take a share with them in returning some service to the community to which they owed protection and many of the comforts and conveniences of life, and to take some part in the government of his native city.

The Manchester Guardian in the leaderette on the occasion, from which we have already quoted, says:—

It is gratifying to find a man at eighty years of age, with a long record of unblemished public service behind him, still actively devoting himself as unremittingly as ever to the work of the city. It would have been almost inexcusable to allow the event to pass without some public recognition, and it was peculiarly fitting that the recognition should come from his colleagues on the Watch Committee, who have seen Mr. Rawson in the last few years, at a time of life when he might well have claimed repose, set himself to a difficult, onerous, and delicate task and successfully accomplish it.

A not less gratifying feature in the celebration was a party which Mr. Rawson gave in the Monton Memorial Schools to the employés of his firm (H. Rawson and Co.) and their wives. Ample evidence was afforded of the happiest relations between employer and employed in the welcome of the host to his guests, and in a presentation which they made to him. Mrs. Rawson being called upon to say a few words, referred to the entire confidence with which her husband could leave his business to take the frequent holidays which were good for him, or to attend to his numerous public engagements. He was assured that the interest of all concerned was as much to be relied upon as his own.

OBITUARY.

MR. DANIEL JONES.

THE London Welsh Unitarian Movement has sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Mr. Daniel Jones, which took place on the 25th ult., at the age of thirty-one, thus bringing to an untimely end what promised to be a brilliant scholastic and scientific career. Last Sunday evening the Welsh service at Essex Hall was dedicated to his memory. The Rev. Enoch E. Jenkins, of Manchester College, officiated, and in the course of his sermon paid a high tribute to the sterling worth and exemplary character of the deceased, who had been associated with the Movement almost from its inception in 1895. He will be sorely missed, for his presence at the meetings was always an inspiration. For the last two years or so he had been the leading spirit in the work, conducting the Sunday evening services most acceptably and efficiently. At the close of the service last Sunday, Mr. Delta Evans, who spoke with much difficulty, proposed a vote of condolence with the widowed mother and other relatives of their departed friend. The vote was carried in silence, the congregation standing.

A correspondent from Cribyn, in South Wales, also writes to us concerning the tragic death of Mr. Daniel Jones, telling of the widespread sorrow it has caused in his native village. For the last nine years Mr. Jones had held teaching appointments under the West Ham School Board at Forest Gate, but always returned to Cribyn for his summer holidays. There on Thursday, the 29th ult., the funeral took place, and on Sunday a funeral sermon was preached.

MR. JOHN BARRON, DOUGLAS, I.M.

MANY readers will share our regret at the announcement of the death of Mr. John Barron, which occurred suddenly on the 27th ult. at his residence, Douglas, Isle of Man. In former years, before the Unitarian congregation was beset by the troubles which led to its dispersion, Mr. Barron was well known to all who took part in the services, and they will cherish his memory as an ardent supporter of the cause, generous of his substance, and unfailing in personal devotion. He settled in Douglas about thirty years ago, and succeeded in attaining a position highly honourable and useful in the community. He was for some years a member of the Town Council, and served on the School Board with signal ability and intelligence. A thoroughly kind-hearted and genial friend, he was none the less tenacious of the views that seemed right to him, and in his business as in his private character he furnished a worthy example of uprightness and integrity.

Mr. Barron, who was fifty-four years old, leaves a widow—the sister of the late Rev. Charles Waid—and a grown-up family, with whom deep sympathy will be felt.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

NEAR Christmas time how gay the shops are, and how lovely the toys are in the windows! At the window of one of these shops stood two very ragged little children, looking in with the greatest excitement at all the beautiful things. A lady was looking in also, behind them, and she heard them cry out: "Oh! oh! oh!" And then: "Look here, Johnnie!" "No, look here, Maggie!" And then Johnnie said: "Oh! that's mine—I'll have that." It was a little omnibus with two horses that he was looking at. "No," said Maggie, "I'll have that." "No, no," said Johnnie; "it's mine, I got it first—I did, I did," and they began to push and struggle in front of the little omnibus that was behind the glass of the window; and they shouted and nearly cried; when all at once a voice behind them said: "Well, you see the best of it is that you can both have it, and the omnibus won't get broken, as it is safe in the window." Their little pushing and struggling hands stopped, and they both turned round to see who spoke; then they both turned back quite gently and quietly, to look again at the lovely omnibus, and the little dingy hands patted the glass behind which it was safe. "Don't you think so?" said the lady. "Yes," said Johnnie, thoughtfully; and then he looked up and smiled at the lady; and then they enjoyed the omnibus again without fighting for it, standing close together, side by side. And many little children like Maggie and Johnnie get their joy at Christmas time out of all the pretty things they can see, even though they cannot have them for their own. Many children get no presents at Christmas; but very many delight in looking in at the windows, and fancying themselves the happy owners of dolls, ponies, omnibuses, and more beautiful toys than any one child could ever possess.

I hope many of you have been for a long time saving up all the pennies and halfpennies that you have had—that you might be able to get some nice Christmas presents for your father and mother or friends. Some children eat up all their pennies, as fast as they get them, by buying sweets and things to eat. But if they cared to try they would soon find how much nicer it is to save up their money till there is enough to get some nice presents with it, than to spend it on things which are gone directly.

A little girl saved up her pennies carefully, and meant to get a present for her father for Christmas; and when the time came near she turned out to be very rich; for when she counted her money she had twelve pennies—a whole shilling! She knew that there was to be a lovely Christmas pudding at home, for she had helped her mother to get it ready; and one day, just before the holidays, she was chattering to her school-fellows about the pudding, and the presents she was going to buy, and all the fun that they would have at Christmas, when she saw one of her companions looking very sad, and as if she was going to cry. When they went out of the play-ground Nellie found the little girl, and said to her: "Why do you look so sad, Annie? Are you ill?" Annie began to cry, and at first would not say anything; but after a while she dried her eyes, and said: "Never mind; it can't be helped." "What can't be helped, Annie?" said Nellie; "do tell me; you make me miserable." So Annie told her that her father had had no work for weeks past, and mother and baby were both ill; and there was no Christmas pudding for them, and no one to do the work at home but herself, and she was so tired, and it was all so sad. Nellie was very sorry, and did all she could to comfort the poor little girl, and when she said good-bye, she said: "Perhaps things will get better at Christmas, Annie; don't despair."

And then she walked on; and, as she went, the thought came to her again from somewhere—"Perhaps things will get better at Christmas"; and again and again the same words seemed to come to her: "Perhaps—perhaps," she thought; "but why shouldn't I make it not perhaps but certain?"

She went home, and waited impatiently till her father came in; and then she told him about Annie's home, and said: "Father, I've got a whole shilling, and I wanted to get you a present with it; but I think, if you'll forgive having no present, I will get something for Annie with it." Her father said he would much rather do without his present, that she might get something for Annie; and then he said; "And look here, Nell, you must let me join, and my present to you shall be another shilling, to spend for Annie."

Nellie was delighted; and she went to a shop where pies were made, and she bought a big pie of good meat; "for," she said, "it's better to have meat than pudding, and I won't spend all the money on things to eat." And then she bought a nice little warm shawl for Annie, for she had no jacket to go to school in. She wrapped up the things and asked her big brother to go and leave them for Annie; and she wrote in large letters—"A Christmas-box for Annie." How happy Annie was, and how grateful, and what a nice Christmas Day they had because one friend had been kind to them and remembered them! And Nellie and her father were just as happy too; and Christmas is a time when everyone should try to make some one happy.

"Help someone to keep Christmas morn,
The day that Jesus Christ was born."

Birthdays should be happy days, and especially the birthday of Jesus, who tried to make everyone happy, and was so kind and good himself. Don't you think that the best way in which we can show our love to Jesus is to try to make someone happier on his birthday, as he would have done?

God is our Father, and when His children are selfish or unkind it must make Him sorry. Do you ever think of that? It is a very great thought. Let us try and be more like Jesus, in whom God was well pleased. But we must not wait; we must begin now; and if we can see any kind deed that we can do, to lighten the sorrows or sadness of others, we may grow more like Jesus, and more what God wishes us to be, if we do it at once, and with all our hearts, and with a loving wish to share with others the happiness which God has given to us.

A happy Christmas to you, dear children! GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

LONDON, DECEMBER 8, 1900.

AT THE END OF A CENTURY.

WE are drawing near to the close of a century, and soon all of our life which has been included in its term will be in the past, but so as to remain a potent force in the shaping of the future. It is natural for us at such a time to seek to gather up in thought the chief treasures that the past has given us, to impress more deeply upon ourselves the lessons it has taught, and not least the lessons of humility and charity and honest confession of our own failures and wrong-doing, but at the same time the deeper lessons of trust and undying hope, that we may lay hold on that Strength, not our own, which will work for us the redeeming of our life and its consecration to a better service.

It is folly if we turn away from the solemn thought of the swift passing of our time ; it is blindness if we fail to realise that at this moment all the fulness of Eternity is close about us, that our spiritual being may be penetrated through and through with the gifts of life which cannot be taken away, and that our rest is for ever in the living GOD. We look before and after, into illimitable distance which daunts every effort of our thought : it is that we may learn to give ourselves up in perfect, child-like surrender to the Eternal, and find our strength, our joy, our peace, in the secret place of His revealing.

The future is open before us, as the untried field of our duty ; it is out of the past, gathered into our living present, that the knowledge of life is given to us and those treasures of love and communion with the unseen, and with those who are still companions of our way, which are more to us than all other possessions of our life.

With GOD are given to us those abiding treasures of the spiritual life. Our fathers have taught us, indeed, many things, but best of all is the gift of themselves; and this is one of the profoundest truths brought home to us by the passing century, that we cannot be separated from their fellowship, but take with us into the untried future the solace and strength which their wisdom and their love pour into our hearts.

This surely is the true significance of our Christian discipleship, which leaps now across twenty centuries, and enters into close personal communion with that supreme life of old, knowing JESUS and following him, as he manifested the true spirit of the Son of GOD, in that distant land and in his brief mortal years, yet knowing him not as a memory alone in ancient history, but as a living friend, an inspiration in our present life, while we think of him—where, we know not—but still about his FATHER'S business, still living unto GOD.

And so out of our own immediate past, from this century which is now almost gone, we receive untold riches of the deeper life. During these last weeks, and especially at the Christmas season, memories will throng upon the heart too deep for words ; but life will be richer, and we shall go forward with a better courage, for what these days have been to us.

Turning now to the thought of our churches, we find that the same impulse of retrospect takes hold of us, and with the same purpose, that we may realise the richness of our inheritance, the fulness of that communion which may be ours in the fellowship of our Free Churches, and the insistent call which so comes to us, with new strength and insight to do our part in the service of the world.

The part to which our religious community is called is not conspicuous in the world's eyes, but it is none the less a Divine calling which has come to us, into the fulfilment of which must be poured all the joy of a whole-hearted service. Throughout the present year we have had it in mind to gather up in a series of special articles for our readers some record of the progress of the century in matters most closely affecting our religious life. The purpose has been partially, though we regret to say, only partially fulfilled; and latterly in particular we are glad to have been able to publish the series of articles, not yet completed, dealing with the greater religious bodies of this country. From them all we have much to learn, and learn the most as we are able the most fully to enter with genuine sympathy into the secret of their inward life. But while that is so, what must touch us most nearly is the past experience of our own community, and we must attempt during the coming weeks to gather up the chief lessons of that experience.

It has been a century fraught with much eager and earnest life, not free, it is true, from failures and disappointments, yet wonderfully rich in noble lives, which still with all their gracious influence are part of our inheritance. It will be possible now to put into words only a little of what this past must mean to us, but that little will be offered in all sincerity, and with the confident hope and trust that, by reason of what has been given to us, and what is now open to us in the good providence of GOD, the future shall be greater and more richly blest even than the past.

AN EARNEST PLEA FOR UNITY.

The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, at the request of the Joint Brahmo Committee in Calcutta, has published in the three papers, which represent different sections of the Brahmo Somaj of India, an appeal of great force to the members of that community, to sink their unhappy differences in united religious work.

Speaking as the representative of the Unitarians of England, who are united by such close ties of sympathy to their Indian brethren of the Brahmo Somaj, Mr. Williams pleads that as a first step towards a complete unity, the members of the different sections should in self-forgetfulness engage in some common works of beneficence, as indeed they have recently done, in their devoted administration of the Famine Relief Fund.

In answer to the objection that there are differences which insuperably stand in the way, Mr. Williams asks :—

> Are they vital, radical, and fundamental differences in the conceptions of God, of man, of man's relation to God, of worship, of human duty and human destiny? If they are, then alas for Brahmoism! A house divided against itself cannot stand. But they are not. As far as I can learn they are, first, personal differences; and I venture to say they are entirely unworthy of men who preach to the world the Universal Fatherhood of God and the Universal Brotherhood of Man. They are, secondly, differences of administration; but surely church government is not a vital, organic part of religion. It is mere machinery, a mere human convenience which, like clothes, can be changed or adapted according to conditions and circumstances. Surely, also, under all forms of administration it is the same God who worketh all-in-all.

Having, then, pointed to the essential unity, in spite of many differences, among the Unitarians of England and of America, Mr. Williams refuses to believe that the same happy result may not be achieved by the Brahmos of India, and as to those differences he cries :—

> Oh for some blast of God to wither them all up, and then for the soft breath of God to bring forth flowers where before there were only thorns, choking the Word and making it unfruitful.

Then, as to the difficulties standing in the way, they exist, he declares, to be vanquished. The appeal concludes :—

> "To men instinct with the spirit of God, instinct with the will and purpose of God, to men whose whole being is absorbed in the work of saving the world for God, what are difficulties? To men who are intent on being eyes to the blind, and ears to the deaf, and feet to the lame, and strength and salvation to them that are ready to perish, what are difficulties? Oh, children of the One Eternal Father, lovers of mankind, and hasteners of God's Kingdom, make speed to find a way out of difficulties! 'Revive, O Lord, Thy work in us, that we may stir it up, and grow in it, to the end of our lives.' 'Let us think together in truth; and walk together in peace.'

"Be our differences and our difficulties what they may, we are all alike confronted with deadly enemies in the shape of sins with all their miserable results, and God Himself calls upon us to unite our forces against the 'lusts of the flesh and the pride of life.' Intellectual error is an evil; yet who of us with the imperfections and limitations of our nature is, or can be, free from it? But awful, terrible, are the meanness, the selfishness, the falsehood, the impurity, the cruelty, the licentiousness, which corrupt society everywhere, and destroy the soul. These are the real curse of man and humanity. Shall we not, for the love of God and of man, close our ranks and form ourselves again into 'One army of the Living God' against these infernal foes? Heart-breaking are the appeals of the woes, the sufferings, the miseries, the tragedies of daily life. Shall we not inter all differences in everlasting oblivion, and seek a way to triumph over all difficulties, that, with hand joined in hand, in unity of spirit and in unity of work, we may heal the broken in heart and bind up their wounds? May He who is the Father of us all, bring us all together—together, that is the word—as fellow-labourers with Him. And if we ourselves have but the heart, the will, the prayerful disposition to take only a single step, to begin with, in that direction, He will bless it, and will nourish that tiny seed, until it bring forth thirty, sixty, and a hundred-fold."

WINIFRED HOUSE.

Invalid Children's Convalescent Nursery Home, Wray-crescent, Tollington-park, London, N.

SIR,—I trust that you will kindly allow me to give my usual informal half-yearly report of the work done at Winifred House in your columns of this week's issue.

At our last annual meeting we expressed some anxiety on account of funds, not only because there had been, owing to deaths, some slight decrease in our ordinary income, but also because the nest-egg, laid by in Consols, had been required to pay for a system of re-drainage and house repairs. Very happily for us, however, the executors of the late Mr. John W. Bentley—in response to our appeal, supported by many friends who knew the work done in Winifred House—allotted to it, out of an amount left by him for charities, the sum of £500, which enabled us to supply our deficiencies, and to buy in £400 into Consols, to be ready for future emergencies. But we still need to remind friends that we require a larger assured income; and we cordially invite all who are interested in Winifred House, to make its work known among others who are likely to be willing and able to help to increase the funds.

Our children have never done better than during the past twelvemonth, and though our numbers have not been quite so great, perhaps, as in some previous years, the results have been most encouraging. Among these I may especially draw attention to a boy of nine and a girl of twelve, both of whom had been on their backs for over a year; these have lately returned home quite restored to health and ready for school. Perhaps our greatest triumph has been the case of a little child of three years, the only daughter of a labouring couple who came to London a year ago, and who evidently did not understand the necessary conditions of hygiene and food in our big city. On her arrival little Nellie looked indeed a poor specimen of humanity, and some members of the Committee felt that we were undertaking a case where permanent improvement was almost impossible. But after a week of careful "mothering" the child began to show real signs of progress, and this steadily continued until, after eight weeks, we were able to give her back to her most grateful parents, in sturdy condition, and having gained at the rate of almost a pound in weight for every week she had been with us. The doctor who had recommended the case wrote after the child had gone home: "I think you may add another life saved to your list. . . . I am sure that only great care and attention brought her to a state of health she has never known before. She is now the 'pride of the Mews.'"

It is such cases as these that make us feel that there is a real need for Homes like ours, and it is always a regret when beds are vacant. We can take nine carrying cases and nine debility ones, and we know that, alas! there are plenty of children needing our care; but it happens that just now—partly because a larger batch of little ones were ready to return home at the same time than usual, and so left a larger number of beds to be filled up—we have a few vacant places, and are desirous of making it known among our friends that we are ready for more work! Especially at Christmas the health conditions of poor homes are bad for delicate children, for there is more overcrowding, and the feasting is not of the wisest. If, therefore, any of your readers know of little ones needing our care, I shall be very pleased to forward all particulars if they apply to me either at Winifred House, or to 11, Highbury-crescent, N.

I must not conclude my report without mentioning the welcome parcels of garments, fruit, and other food, and flowers, that find their way from time to time to Wray-crescent, which are always so warmly appreciated. And may I say to any friends who are thinking of sending presents for Old Father Christmas to distribute, that we shall be glad to have them early in the month, if possible, so that we may make our arrangements accordingly.

MARTINEAU AND TAYLER MEMORIAL.

SIR,—After consultation with Mr. Hope Pinker, the eminent sculptor, we are now in a position to supplement the letter which you kindly printed a fortnight ago about the proposed memorials to Dr. Martineau and the Rev. J. J. Tayler in Little Portland-street Chapel.

White marble medallions, with suitable mountings and inscriptions, could probably be procured at a cost of 200 guineas each. The preparation of the wall, &c., would bring the total cost of this joint memorial to £500 or thereabouts.

The treasurer has already received £160 towards this amount, and hopes that other donations will be forthcoming, so that the work may be quickly put in hand. It is felt that it would be a pity to place tablets in the chapel with the inscriptions without the medallion portraits, as those who actually heard Dr. Martineau and Mr. Tayler are gradually growing fewer in number, and a delineation of the features will be worth much to those who never knew them, especially to visitors from the provinces and America who come to visit the scene of Dr. Martineau's London ministry.

Where larger and more ambitious commemorative schemes have for the present failed to obtain support it is earnestly to be hoped that this smaller and more manageable one may quickly be realised. May we add, in response to some inquiries, that the restoration of the chapel has been completed, and the charges for this purpose have been entirely met.

Contributions to the Memorial Fund should be sent to the Hon. Treasurer at 1, Gordon-square, W.C.

THE BOYS IN OUR GREAT CITIES.

AND ANYWHERE ELSE.

Two suggestive articles on the above subject have appeared in your columns during the past fortnight. The first, from the pen of Miss Marian Pritchard, vividly indicated the great and pressing need for something to be done, and the sound principles upon which anything effective can be done. Mr. John Ballantyne was then induced to give your readers, in the second article, a brief but, as it seemed to me while I read it, a heart-quickening account of what already has been done for the boys in one of our Sunday-schools. Mr. Ballantyne's modest statement just gives that touch of definiteness which we all want to encourage us with regard to some of our ideals. Then we see that a thing can be done, because it has been! May I venture to ask all your readers who are concerned about young people, not only "in our great cities," but, as I have taken leave to add, "anywhere else," to turn again to your columns of the last two weeks, and, if they have not already done so, con over the articles here referred to?

There can be no question among us, I think, that the need for something to be done is as great as Miss Pritchard indicates. The real question is: Will these Boys' Own Brigades, as described by Mr. Ballantyne—will these, better than anything else we know, meet the need? I want at once to say that, in my judgment, they seem most likely. I could not have said this a while ago. I must own that my mind has changed on the subject. Only perhaps I ought to say that my objections to these brigades arose, like Dr. Johnson's error in another matter, out of "pure ignorance, Madam — pure ignorance." The objections, I now find, were theoretical, not actual. And I fancy it may be so with most people. Anyway, I have been gradually convinced that such a Boys' Own Brigade as Mr. Ballantyne and others conduct at one of our London Unitarian schools would be a good thing in most of our schools.

To my mind there is no more important work for us to do than to slowly build up the character of our young people just now. And I am as absolutely certain as I am of anything that there is nothing yet discovered or revealed by which character can better be built up than by Unitarianism. The sense of God, the sense of Duty, the sense of delight in Obedience to the Highest, the sense of Comradeship with all Souls, and the sense of Loyalty to a Leader—Christ—these are some of the helpful things which Unitarianism has enabled me through a not small and not unvaried experience with boys, to teach and train them in.

But you must first catch your boy! And you must catch him by the things he is interested in. Fortunately the natural boy is interested in some things —and those among or on the way to the highest things. For instance, he is interested in Courage, in Drill, in Discipline, in Promotion, &c. These, then, are the handles wherewith to lay hold of him. This "B. O. B." of our own does this.

Let me say frankly that I regard most of what is done in such a Brigade as means to an end. The end is character. Means change as years go on. In our own day some of us have used various sorts of means—and all of them good for the time. I suppose wisdom consists in knowing when machinery is no longer efficient, and in utilising something better. We have to keep our eyes chiefly upon the product—character—and use every legitimate means to that end.

The practical question now is: What can we in our Sunday-schools do about these Boys' Own Brigades? That is for teachers and others to consider. One thing I know, the boys will like it: and that is half the battle. Another advantage is that in most neighbourhoods, if not actually within one's own school or congregation, it is not difficult to get a volunteer of good character (and I would have no other) who would take pleasure in teaching what few of us perhaps could undertake. The boys will regard this as the main thing. We must take care that it isn't—though if it were it would be so far so good. As one who knows something about "Children's Happy Evenings," "Recreative Classes," "Reading Circles," &c., I feel moved to say that I can see in these "Boys' Own Brigades," as carried on by Mr. Ballantyne, a not only unobjectionable, but a truly commendable means towards that permanent object which is the highest we know—namely, the slow and sure and beautiful up-building of the character of our boys, not only on Sundays, but on week-days.

DR. P. T. FORSYTH ON THE UNITARIANISM OF DR. MARTINEAU.

II.

AND now we must hasten to say, what we ought to have said before, that Dr. Martineau was thoroughly well acquainted with this theory of certain idealists that the society is the real unit, and that what is called the individual is a mere abstraction; and he deliberately repudiated it on the ground that it was as wholly unsupported by reason and by psychological experience as, in his view, is that doctrine of a three-fold society in the Godhead, which this recent sociological theory of the unity of humanity is strangely supposed to resemble and to support. And Dr. Martineau is very far from being alone in his emphatic rejection of this demoralising conception of the individual man as a mere organ or function of a collective humanity. Not only do evolutionist writers, such as Mr. Leslie Stephen, deny that society as a whole has any unity properly so called; but idealist writers, such as Professor Charles D'Arcy, most emphatically declare that it is "utterly impossible to see how the self of a man, the most definite unit which thought is able to conceive, can possess its unity by relation to such an amorphous mass of tissue as we find actual society to be." And in a like strain Mr. McTaggart, of Cambridge, one of the warmest admirers and ablest expositors of Hegel's writings, contends that Hegel's works in no way support the conception of Society as an Organism; and he adds:

> The true lesson to be derived from the philosophy of Hegel is that society cannot be an end, for any one, at least, who rightly holds that philosophy. . . . Each of us is more than the society which unites us, because there is in each of us the longing for a perfection which that society can never realise. The parts of a living body can find their end in that body, though it is imperfect and transitory. But a self-conscious person can dream of perfection, and having once done so, he will find no end short of perfection. Here he has no abiding city.

This quotation from a Hegelian writer, while it is utterly opposed to Dr. Forsyth's theory of the individual's relation to collective humanity, has close affinity with Dr. Martineau's view that it is not to Society but rather to the immanent God who directly speaks to each and to all men in their moral ideal that final appeal is made for the settlement of all questions of right and duty. Professor Muirhead tells us that it is wrong to commit suicide, because "no man has a life of his own to take; his life has been given him, and made all that it is by Society"; we hardly think that Dr. Forsyth would accept this logical outcome of his personification of Society. Surely Dr. Martineau is a truer moralist when he teaches that it is not obligation to the fictitious organic unity called Society, but rather to the indwelling Father and to the Spirit of Love, which is one form of that Father's self-revelation, which checks the hand that is raised for self-destruction. No one has taught more impressively than Dr. Martineau how invaluable and indispensable social life is for the awakenment and development of the individual's moral and religious nature; and at the same time no one has more conclusively shown that it is the felt immanence of the same Eternal God in all souls which links men together, and makes permanent and progressive societies possible and actual.

According to Dr. Forsyth the fatal defect that vitiates more or less all Dr. Martineau's philosophy, whether theological or ethical, is his "individualism" and "atomism." Now we venture to think that the universal God within each one of us is also in His dealing with mankind strongly individualistic; and that, in spite of Dr. Forsyth's dictum that "collective humanity is the true and real man," Jesus of Nazareth and James Martineau are entirely in the right when they declare that it is the individual soul, and not mankind in aggregations, which is the special object of love and interest and personal communion to the indwelling Eternal One. Dr. Forsyth says that Dr. Martineau was of the Greek type of mind, but that he was "a very Christian Greek." To us, we must say, all Dr. Forsyth's language about collective humanity and the "abstract" individual has a very strong Hellenic flavour; and, had we nothing but this from Dr. Forsyth's pen, we should be inclined to say that there was much of the Greek in him but very little of the Christian; for all this speculation about "collective humanity" appears pervaded by the notion, which is so often met with in Plato and Aristotle, that the important thing and the true end is the state, and that the individual citizen is only valuable as a means for the furtherance of that supreme end—a fallacy which both Stoicism and Christianity have effectually disposed of.

We conclude, then, that Dr. Forsyth's supposed analogy between the Trinity and a quasi-personal unity called "Society" or "Humanity" is a pure fiction. However closely the members of human societies are connected together by instincts and affections, by common passions and purposes, by the strong tendency to imitation and by hereditary continuity, there is no rational ground for asserting that they, in any case, form a unitary organism, and share in one common indivisible life. The individual man is not, as Dr. Forsyth contends he is, a mere abstraction from a real social unity; on the contrary, societies derive whatever degree of unity and harmony they possess from the combining influence of the one ultimate unity, the self-existent God, in whom all the members of the society alike have their being, and from whose felt immanence they realise their own intrinsic brotherhood, and the essential unity of the rational, moral, and spiritual life in each and all. Dr. Forsyth makes the utterly unaccountable assertion that Dr. Martineau's Intuitionalism is "subjective" in its nature. "Intuitionalism," he says, "means that you cannot step outside yourself with your certainty; it is not objective for mankind, it is only true for you." Can Dr. Forsyth really regard geometrical and ethical intuitions as having only subjective validity? Surely it is the very essence of such intuitions that they carry with them the complete conviction that they are necessarily true for all men; and hence they are supposed by most philosophers to afford some measure of insight into the essence and character of the Absolute and Eternal One.

If there really is any analogy between "collective humanity" and Dr. Forsyth's threefold society in the Godhead; if his three interpenetrating persons are related to each other in any way similar to the way in which the persons in a human society are related to one another, then, we contend, Dr. Martineau's critic is inevitably landed in a Tritheism of the most pronounced and pagan sort. And, indeed, the language he uses about the relation of these three personalities is wholly unintelligible, unless it means that each of them has a separate consciousness and a separate will. It is true that they are said to "mutually interpenetrate," but this can only mean that each is directly aware of what is in the consciousness of the other two. It appears, for instance, that the Second Person in the Trinity "is the standing mediator in the nature, as well as the history of the soul's communion with God. . . . If the divine nature mediates to our spirits by a cosmos, or a society, why not by a person with its appropriate methods?" Now, what intelligible meaning can be attached to these words, unless it be that the person who mediates has a will essentially distinct and separate from that of the person who is supposed to be made accessible by this act of mediation? And, further, we may reasonably ask what is the part or function performed by the third assumed personality, whose activity is strangely ignored all through Dr. Forsyth's long article, and whose presence in the "society" of the Godhead could, so far as we can learn from Dr. Forsyth's exposition, be altogether dispensed with. We are told by Dr. Forsyth that if we call his language about the two or three personalities in the Godhead virtual Ditheism or Tritheism, we show ourselves to be "incorrigible individualists"!

There can be little doubt that Dr. Forsyth in his frequent references to Dr. Martineau's "individualism," and in his assertion that "Dr. Martineau's Theism is but his individualism writ large, while a Trinity is social, rational, universal," has to a great extent misapprehended the real position of Dr. Martineau and his disciples. Dr. Martineau does, it is true, sometimes use language concerning the Supreme Being, which may be interpreted to mean that he regards Him as a personality differing from human personalities only by the infinity of His attributes, and not by any transcendency in His essential nature, and as related to human persons in essentially the same way as these persons are related to each other. But that this does not fully express his deepest thought on this great subject is evident from the fact that he also speaks of God as the "Soul of souls"; and declares that God communicates His own infinity to the spirit of man, for, as he says, no merely finite being "can possibly believe the infinite." So, too, he maintains that in the ideal of moral and spiritual perfection which is to some extent present in the consciousness of all men, but pre-eminently so in Christ and Christlike souls, "God is personally there, giving expression to His spiritual nature, as in the visible universe to His causal power."

We do not assert that Dr. Martineau has fully developed in his writings this profound and inspiring conception of the living presence, or incarnation, of God in Nature, and especially in the self-consciousness of His human offspring, and we are very far from denying that the "new universalism" has in this direction been exceedingly helpful to religious thought; but we do emphatically assert that Dr. Martineau has not left it at all doubtful that he clearly recognised the truth and far-reaching influence of this conception of God's immanence in Nature and Humanity. Unitarians accordingly, who at all sufficiently realise this "personal presence" of God in the rational, ethical and religious life of man, may well feel assured that all our ideals of personal relationship, all that is divine and permanent in human friendship and affection, all noble public spirit, all glowing enthusiasm of humanity, are inspired by and in some measure reveal the essentially "social" nature of the Eternal Mind and Heart which animates and unifies the cosmos, and which both seeks and finds intimate spiritual communion with the divinest Sons of God. Into the inner, or subjective, side of the self-consciousness of the Eternal, human vision evidently cannot directly penetrate; but the all-sustaining sense of Divine support and sympathy which the suffering saviours of humanity always experience, can hardly fail to suggest and sustain in us, as in the early Christians, the idea that the self-sacrifice and the sympathetic sorrow, which characterise the highest human lives in their highest moods, have a real but sublimer counterpart in the inner life of Him who is the prompter and supporter of these painful acts of perfect self-devotion. How far, if at all, the very evolution of the cosmos involves self-sacrifice in God, we seem to have no means of determining, but we do see that the end to which all the evolutionary processes of Nature converge appears to be the providing of the necessary physical and psychical conditions for the existence of beings capable of consciously communing with what we have ventured to call the Mind and Heart of God; and, therefore, if this be a rational universe, we may well believe that this provision for divine communion on the human side corresponds with and satisfies a social essence and a social need in that Absolute and Eternal One who has fashioned His rational offspring after His own image.

Dr. Forsyth is wholly in error if he thinks, as he appears to do, that one of the reasons why Dr. Martineau and Unitarians generally are unable to accept his view of the Godhead is that they cannot abide with mysteries; for they know full well that the felt relationship between the individual soul and the Father within it is of far too profound a nature to be fathomed and clearly explained by the human understanding. The poet truly says—

> Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line
> Severing rightly His from thine,
> Which is human, which Divine;

and in like manner Dr. Martineau writes—

> I know not whether others can draw a sharp line of separation between the human spirit and the Divine, and can clearly say where their own soul ends and God's communion begins; but for myself, with closest thought, I confess my darkness; and can only say that somehow He certainly stirs among our higher affections and mingles with the action of our proper nature.

The reason why Dr. Martineau contended for a rational and universal society in the Godhead, and rejected the limited and arbitrary threefold Society which Dr. Forsyth seeks to establish, was simply this, that he could find in this latter conception no intrinsic marks of its being a spiritual truth, but could find in it the clearest marks of its being a product of human speculation—a product whose genesis and development can be explained, and in which the erroneous element which will prevent it from holding a permanent place among the religious convictions of mankind can be distinctly discerned.

That which is eternally true and real in the time-honoured dogma of a tri-une God can without difficulty be dissociated from the speculative intellectual form which the religious feeling and philosophic genius of the early Christian centuries slowly elaborated. The unspeakably precious truth which is enshrined in the Athanasian Trinity—a truth which has divinely fed and comforted innumerable believers—is that in Jesus, and in the ideals which Jesus revealed and realised, we possess a genuine revelation of the immediate activity and essential character of the indwelling Father. In declaring that Jesus was no mere product of God's creative power, but was of the same substance with the Father, so that in his stainless purity, in his infinite pity and forgiveness, in his self-sacrificing love, the Eternal God was, as Dr. Martineau expresses it, "personally there," the Trinitarian dogma has preserved through the ages the most precious element in the faith and teaching of the founder of Christianity. It was because this Athanasian dogma thus asserted the essential immanence and personal self-revelation of God in Jesus that Dr. Martineau considered it to be a providential circumstance that the Athanasian party prevailed over the Arian in the great controversy. Dr. Martineau clearly perceived that the formulators of the Trinitarian dogma of the existence of Divinity in Humanity in the special case of Jesus unconsciously did the greatest possible service to the development of sound religious ideas; for they constantly kept before the mind of the Church the conception of God in man—a conception which was sure in the fulness of time to be extended from the alleged exceptional instance of the son of Mary of Nazareth to all God's rational offspring. The time has now come when this basal truth of man's essential divinity is bursting through and dissolving the ancient dogma which has so long and so beneficially preserved and transmitted it from its advent in the spiritual insight of Jesus to its recent reassertion in its original purity and fulness in many of the deepest and most religious thinkers of the present day. The Christian Church is just now beginning to reap, in the widely spreading views concerning God's Incarnation in all souls, and par excellence in Jesus, the precious, but largely unintended and unexpected, fruits of that ancient conception of the essentially Divine nature of the world's representative prophet and saint, which was providentially stereotyped in the ancient creeds. And thus the words ascribed to Jesus, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," are now happily receiving their literal fulfilment. CHARLES B. UPTON.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual business meeting of this Association was held in the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 1. Mr. JAMES GRAHAM presided, and there was a large attendance.

The Secretary submitted his draft reported, which, with several alterations, was adopted. After dealing with the positions of the churches at Dundee, Aberdeen, Kirkcaldy, and South St. Mungo, and welcoming the Rev. James Forrest to St. Vincent-street Church, it proceeded:—

A broader spirit of toleration and intelligence in religious matters is pervading Scotland, in bringing about which result we may rightly claim our share, and a special effort might now perhaps be made by our churches to attract the mass of the people, particularly those who for certain reasons, among them being a rooted objection to creeds and dogmas, attend no church at all.

Although our particular work during the year has been quiet and unostentatious we are abreast of the age, and everything which makes for a deeper religious feeling and greater harmony interests us.

Recently we have witnessed the marriage of two great Scottish Churches, the Free and the United Presbyterian, under the name of the United Free Church of Scotland. We offer the new Church our sincere good wishes for its future success. We believe that the step will tend to broaden men's minds and extend the area of freedom, yet we cannot but regret that the new Church should still retain unrevised the Westminster Confession of Faith of two-and-a-half centuries ago.

The officers were thereafter elected, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the meeting to a close. Subsequently a conference of the newly-formed Scottish Unitarian Sunday-school Union was held under Mr. GRAHAM'S presidency, when several papers were read and considerable discussion ensued. Mr. Copeland Bowie was present, and by his earnestness, energy and courtesy did much to enthuse and encourage the members.

THE EVENING MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held.

Mr. JAMES GRAHAM, who presided, said they were sometimes told in these days that the need for the Unitarian faith was passing away, that their mission had been accomplished, and that they might set themselves aside and allow the great tide of reform and enlightenment in the world of religion to do its work. As he read the signs of the times, it appeared to him that the mission of spiritual Unitarianism was just about to begin. Men's minds had been disturbed as perhaps they had never been disturbed before in the history of the world, a great revolution was taking place, the whole scheme of men's thoughts was being changed, and in a great many cases people were looking round and inquiring as to what was left to them. A great work of destruction was being accomplished, and what he thought would be left was—the great faith which they called Unitarian, the faith with a great underlying spiritual unity that had been at work since the beginning of history. Recent newspaper correspondence—begun originally, he thought, by something written by Dr. Marcus Dods—seemed to show that a very large percentage of the population had entirely given up all the old views regarding God's relation to the world, the relation of men as spiritual beings to God, and all the old-fashioned ideas regarding supernatural revelations, and were coming more and more to look at these matters after the manner of Unitarians. There was in these circumstances opportunity for a great Unitarian teacher, some great spiritually-minded soul who saw into the real truth, and who had the power to win the hearts and souls of mankind, and set the truth before them in a way that would satisfy both the heart and intellect. This was the mission of Unitarianism.

The Rev. R. B. DRUMMOND, Edinburgh, moved a vote of welcome to the delegates.

The Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY, Kirkcaldy, who seconded, said that Unitarians were often reminded of the smallness of the numbers attending their congregations. If they were an association for the gaining of money profits, there might be in that way a great deal to deplore. But they were not an association for making money; they were an association for the spread of what they believed to be true, rational, religious thought, and if they were to be judged by the spread of rational and deeply religious thought, then he held that they were the most successful Church in Scotland. One had only to read the reports of the Church of Scotland and of the Church now known as the United Free Church, to discover the fact that the opinions of Unitarians were making tremendous headway. There was, that notwithstanding, a great gulf between Unitarians and the Churches named. He thought the brethren in England were too anxious to bridge that gulf—a gulf which would not be bridged until all tests and creeds were abolished.

The Rev. C. TRAVERS, Carlisle, returned thanks on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, and conveyed the fraternal greetings of that body. He said that the time for destructive preaching or criticism on the part of Unitarians had gone by; they had now entered upon a period when they would have to construct if they were to justify their existence. It was not so much a question of theology as the question whether a real belief in the personal God was or was not to be held by men. Unitarians would have to be upholders of a theistic faith at a time when their orthodox friends were passing through a crisis and were trying to find a new foundation for their religion.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS, Newcastle, who also acknowledged the vote of welcome on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, said that the intelligence of the Christian world was working in the direction of Unitarianism, and that the future would be full of advance to the cause for which they stood.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, secretary to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said that the officers and committee of that Association sent their friendliest greetings to the Scottish Association. In the course of his remarks he said that those who had been born and bred Unitarians in many cases were hardly able to realise, except by a great stretch of imagination, the joy of the religion that they professed to hold. It was when they came in contact, as he sometimes did, with those who after years of anxious struggle, doubt, and despair, found the foundations of their old faith shaken, with apparently nothing left upon which they could stand, and who after coming in touch with Unitarian thought found a new light and joy and peace come into their lives—it was then that they more truly realised the magnificent message which Unitarianism had for the world. Sometimes they imagined that that message was only suited to certain types of mind. That was partly true, and yet it was only true because they had not yet succeeded in translating their message into language suited to the different stages of culture, of life, and of thought among the different classes of the people. He was convinced that if they could only translate their message into the common language of the people among whom they worked, then that message would appeal with power, no matter to whom it was addressed. No one, he hoped, was so narrow as to suppose that their Unitarian thought was going to satisfy every one. Humanity was very complex and varied in its needs; there were people whose mental make-up and whose spiritual temperament were such that the most extreme form of Roman Catholicism fitted into their minds. There were others who were satisfied with their old-fashioned Scotch Presbyterianism—it suited them; they were aided by it, and they did not want to get rid of it. When they came across men and women in religious communities who were perfectly satisfied with the thought and inspiration and joy they found in these communities, Unitarians were not likely to become so intolerant as to imagine that anything dreadful would happen to them because they followed their convictions. They always said to men and women—whether Roman Catholic, Scotch Presbyterian, Methodist, or Baptist—that if they found joy and inspiration in their religion, by all means let them stick to it, work for it, and do their best to make others care for it. But when they had said all that, they had only dealt with a small portion of the world. Sometimes inside a great many of these churches there were groups of men and women who could not find satisfaction for thought or life in the conceptions and creeds of the Churches; while outside the Churches there were still larger numbers, men and women whom they could not call irreligious, who were not atheists and not secularists, yet who, somehow, had not yet been touched by the right kind of religious thought and influence. There lay the great mission of Unitarianism.

The proceedings, which were varied by a musical programme, terminated with votes of thanks.

On Sunday evening the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in St. Vincent-street Church. At the morning service the preacher was the Rev. Frank Walters, and the Rev. J. Forrest gave a brief address on entering upon the ministry of the Church.

Newbury.—Sunday week being "Temperance Sunday," the Rev. E. Turland preached special sermons at the Presbyterian Chapel in the morning on "Snares for the Unwary; or, Stumbling-blocks Men place in the way of the Weak," and in the evening on "The Great Temperance Reformation." A good report appeared in the local Weekly Times.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

London : Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant writes :—I venture again to appeal through your columns in aid of my poor's purse. I am extremely grateful for assistance rendered in past years; but as the demand for assistance is greater than formerly, I trust the response will be adequate to the need. The help solicited has to form the source of supply, not only for the festive season close at hand, but for the emergencies of the following year. Gifts of money and clothing, also toys for the little ones, will be gratefully received by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E.

London : George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes :—Will you allow me to appeal to those kind friends who are willing at this season of the year to assist our work among the poor? On account of the high price of coal, and, in our district, the alarming rise of rents, our local poor are indeed badly off. Any donations will be most thankfully received. I am in need of money for the poors' purse, new or cast-off clothing, books, periodicals, toys, &c., which may either be sent to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C. ; or to my new address, 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, N.

London : Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.—The Rev. W. Wilson writes :—It would be a great favour if those who have been in the good habit of sending subscriptions towards the Christmas parties of both children and adults, or towards presents for the children, or who have sent in presents themselves in the shape of toys, books, and useful articles of clothing, &c., would repeat their charitable actions this Christmas also. We have some 300 children all looking forward to their Christmas treats and presents, and it would be a black Christmas time for them to be disappointed. Mr. F. Nettlefold has already sent £10, and Mrs. Enfield has made a contribution of presents. Gifts may be sent to Miss Anna Sharpe, The Grove, Hampstead, N.W. ; subscriptions either to her or to the Rev. William Wilson, Claremont-road, Cricklewood, N.W.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—A grand Sale of Work was held in the Mechanics' Institute on Friday and Saturday of last week. The object was to free the present iron school-chapel, which was opened last May, from its debt of £300. Conditional upon the raising of £250, a member of the congregation promised the remaining £50. The sale was opened on the first day by Councillor J. W. Pollitt, J.P., under the chairmanship of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. ; on the second day by his Worship the Mayor of Bury (Mr. Thomas Holt), under the chairmanship of the Rev. B. C. Constable, Secretary of East Cheshire Christian Union. The receipts amounted to £252. Fully £100 worth of goods were unsold, and it is expected that subsequent sales in the school-chapel this week will realise a good sum. Our friends had practically only three months to prepare for the sale, and the result is very gratifying. The congregation, which is only three and a-half years old, will finish the year, after erecting a temporary building, free of debt, and early in the new year will issue an extensive appeal to the Unitarian public for help towards its Church Building Fund, on behalf of which it has already £1,000 subscribed.

Bolton.—The first anniversary services were conducted at the Halliwell-road Mission, by the Rev. R. M. Scott, of Ainsworth. There were crowded congregations both afternoon and evening, and the collections amounted to £9 13s. 4d. The Mission was started a year ago in connection with Bank-street Chapel, and up to the present time the results have been most encouraging. At the end of the year's work it is satisfactory to report that there are 64 enrolled members; that during the last month there has been an average attendance at the evening service of 87 adults, and that there was an attendance last Sunday of 123 scholars at the afternoon school.

Chelmsford.—On Sunday week the Rev. E. J. Harry preached a sermon at Legg-street Chapel, in answer to the question, "What is Unitarianism?" The sermon was well reported in a local paper.

Chester.—A successful Rummage Sale was held in the schoolroom on Friday, Nov. 30, and a net profit of £10 10s. was made, which goes towards the reduction of the debt incurred by the restoration of the chapel. Several friends at a distance sent parcels for the sale, and these have our grateful thanks for their contributions. The ladies of the congregation are to be congratulated upon their successful enterprise.

Eastbourne.—The Rev. George St. Clair has been put on the Committee of the Natural History Society, a second vacancy being filled by the Rev. Dr. West, of St. Christopher's.

Exeter (Appointment).—The Rev. J. M. Connell has accepted an invitation to become colleague to the Rev. T. W. Chignell, at George's meeting. Mr. Connell will enter on his ministry there on the first Sunday of the new year.

Gateshead.—A bazaar in aid of the funds was held on Friday, November 30, and Saturday, December 1. The chair on the first day was occupied by Alderman Baxter Ellis, J.P., President of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, and the bazaar was opened by Lady Trevelyan. On the second day Miss Lucas opened the sale. The net proceeds of the bazaar amounted to £70.

Llandyssul.—Last Sunday, at the monthly Communion service, nineteen new members were received, and others have intimated their intention of joining in a month. This is gratifying to minister and congregation. At the annual meeting of the congregation a very encouraging balance-sheet of the treasurer, Miss Grace Jones, was read. It was also resolved to register the chapel for the solemnisation of marriages under the new Marriage Act.

London : Essex Church.—The Essex Church Congregational Society invited the members of Unity Church to an "At Home" on Wednesday, Nov. 28, which invitation was cordially accepted, and a most delightful evening was spent. Mr. Greg's lecture on "The Art and Craft of the Old English Potter," which formed a portion of the programme, was very much enjoyed, and it is to be hoped that this will prove to be only the first of a series of these united social gatherings of the members of the two congregations.

London : Stamford-street.—The last of the series of discourses on "A Great City's Needs" (which has included the subjects of "Recreation," most eloquently expounded by Mrs. Ormiston Chant, much to the pleasure of the congregation ; and "Temperance," trenchantly and ably treated by the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope), was given on Sunday evening last, by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, who spoke on "Religion," in a sympathetic and instructive manner. On the 26th ult. Alderman R. W. Bowers, J.P., gave a lantern lecture on "Southwark in the Olden Time." This, also, was largely attended, the lecture and pictures greatly interesting the audience, descriptive as they were of that part of London in which the chapel is situated. On Dec. 3 a concert was given by members and the choir of the Band of Hope, the latter giving several concerted pieces with excellent effect. The chair was occupied by the president of the band, the Rev. Frederic Allen, who, in a short address on "What shall they be?" earnestly asked the parents present to answer the question by doing all in their power to preserve their children from the baleful effects of drink. A very hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. A. W. Harris for his unwearying exertions in training the children. On Monday next, as will be seen by the Calendar notice, "The Christmas Carol," with lantern pictures, will be given by Mr. Allen.

London : Stratford.—The church anniversary meeting was held on Wednesday, Nov. 28. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., presided, and there was a good attendance of members and friends. A very interesting report of the work of the church, and its kindred institutions, was read by the secretary, Mr. W. J. Hawkins. Encouraging addresses were given by the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, F. Allen, T. E. M. Edwards, H. Woods Perris, Mr. Lucking Tavener, and Miss Tagart. The speeches were interspersed with singing, well rendered by three of the young lady members.

London : Unity Church, Islington.—The annual meeting of the old scholars and teachers of the Sunday-school was held on Dec. 5. The attendance was very small ; some friends suggested that this might be owing to the time of year the meeting is held, and October or early in the spring were proposed as more convenient seasons. Music and songs, with short speeches from Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, Miss M. Preston, Messrs. Mackey and Wade occupied the evening, and the meeting was brought to a close by all joining in "Auld Lang Syne."

Manchester : Longsight.—On Sunday last the annual Scholars' Festival was held at the Free Christian Church, when the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., of Ashton-under-Lyne, conducted the services morning and evening. In the afternoon a cantata, entitled "Consider the Lilies," arranged by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, was rendered by the scholars of the school, Mr. Shanks himself reading the story. The arrangement forms a very pleasing service, suitable for Sunday-school festivals, many of the tunes having appeared from time to time in hymns and choral songs, published by the Sunday School Association.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—Through the efforts of the new president, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., the debit balance on last year's accounts, amounting to £57 6s. 7d., has been cleared off. The committee, at its meeting on Monday evening last, unanimously resolved to invite the Rev. Arthur Harvie to continue his services as missionary minister for at least another year from May 1 next, the Gateshead congregation undertaking to subscribe £50 for one year towards the stipend.

Norwich.—A meeting was held in the Octagon Chapel on Friday, Nov. 30, when a tablet to the memory of the late Mr. C. F. Stevens, placed under the gallery to the right of the pulpit, was presented by his widow and the other members of his family to the congregation. The design of the tablet is of Gothic character, and bears the simple inscription :—"Charles Frederick Stevens, born 27th May, 1818 ; died 18th February, 1900." Mr. A. M. Stevens, in asking the congregation to accept it, said it was at the early age of ten that the late C. F. Stevens was drawn to the Octagon Chapel. He was so struck with the beauty of the building and the simplicity of the worship that he entered the Sunday-school and induced his parents to attend the Octagon services. For nearly three-quarters of a century he was a devoted worshipper and worker there, and for over sixty years he was teacher or superintendent of the Sunday-school. Mr. R. W. Ladell, who presided, accepted the gift on behalf of the congregation, bearing cordial testimony to the worth of their late friend, as did Messrs. I. M. Wade, James Mottram, J. D. Wright, and the Rev. Alfred Hall.

Rotherham.—On Tuesday, Nov. 27, at a meeting of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union, the Rev. Charles Hargrove gave a lecture on "Rome, its Rise and Ruin." The chair was taken by Councillor J. Cox, a prominent Wesleyan, for many years a local preacher. The lecture, which was illustrated by plans and pictures thrown by a lime-light lantern on a screen, gave a most interesting account of the history and growth of the "Eternal City," and the destruction of its ancient buildings by various misfortunes, and the operations of more recent builders. The lecture was warmly appreciated.

South Cheshire and District Association and Sunday School Union.—On Wednesday, Nov. 28, the autumnal meetings of this Union were held at Crewe. Among those present were Mr. R. Mansell (president), Mr. Vickery, and the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury ; Mr. A. Orrett (treasurer) and the Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Chester ; Mr. Stapleton, of Newcastle-under-Lyme ; Mr. Robinson and the Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Crewe ; the Rev. E. A. Maley, of Nantwich ; Mr. John Greenhalgh, of Congleton ; and the Rev. G. A. Payne (secretary), of Knutsford. The business transacted at the committee meeting was of a routine character, while at the Conference a number of important changes for the good of the Union were under consideration. Tea was partaken of in the schoolroom, and in the evening a public religious service was held, when the Rev. H. E. Haycock preached from the text, "Not to destroy but to fulfil," an eloquent sermon.

Swansea.—During the month of November two members passed away—Miss Jenkins, of Brynsifi, and Mr. William Jones. Miss Jenkins had reached her 90th year, and had been connected with the church all her lifetime. Mr. W. Jones passed away in his 45th year. As occupying a leading position in Messrs. Ben Evans and Co., drapers, he was well known as a man of unblemished character. A Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom, Tuesday evening. At the bazaar held last April, the sum of £275 was realised, and Tuesday evening over £25. Thus we are able to look to the opening of the New Century with the church and its property free from all debt, and to increasing influence for the propagation of Unitarian Christianity in the town.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

UNITARIAN CHURCH, IPSWICH.

RESTORATION FUND.

The Committee and Congregation of the above Church have thoroughly restored the building at a cost of over £1,000. There is still some necessary work to be carried out, the principal of which is a suitable Warming Apparatus, which will amount to a considerable sum, the Church being a large one. As the expenditure has already exceeded the amount subscribed by nearly £250, the Committee are unable to proceed further without additional kind help from the Unitarian public, to whom they earnestly appeal.

The Re-opening Services will be held on Sunday, December 16th, when the Rev. WM. LLOYD, of New York, will officiate.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

The following passage from an Address at Ottawa, on Sept. 13th, by Mr. Edmund Owen, M.B., F.R.C.S., an advocate of Vivisection, practically admits the fallacy of trusting to vivisectional results, whilst its frivolous tone in dealing with a serious subject well illustrates one of the worst dangers of Vivisection to those who practise it:—"When some important surgical problem awaits a solution which cannot be effected in the ward or on the operating table, the clinical (bedside) surgeon turns to his enthusiastic and obliging friends in the laboratories, who, in order to help him, straightway proceed with careful thought and gentle hands to sacrifice upon the altar of Hygeia some mongrel curs or a few of those tailless rodents which, so far as I can see, have been provided solely for the use of the experimental physiologist and pathologist. Then, because such-and-such a thing happens under such-and-such circumstances in the laboratory to the dog or the guinea-pig, the experimental pathologist is apt to assume that in different circumstances it must happen also in man himself."—Lancet, Sept. 15th, 1900.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Christmas appeals from our workers among the poor, which we have recently published, and of which another appears in our present issue, will, we are confident, receive a response this year of abundant generosity. It is to be feared that the heavy claims of the war have in many ways stinted the flow of beneficent charity at home, but it is not from our friends that we fear any forgetfulness of those whose need is greatest.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE has fixed Thursday, Jan. 17, as the date on which he hopes to resume his Browning lectures at University College. There will be three weekly lectures to complete the course, which will be followed immediately by the second course of five lectures on other poets between 1840 and 1890, as already announced. What preaching engagements Mr. Brooke will be able to undertake in the new year we do not yet know.

WE are glad to see from a circular issued to teachers by the Sunday-school Association, that arrangements are being actively made for the Twentieth Century Festival Meetings to be held in London in Whit-week, and in which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday-school Association and the "International Council of Unitarians and the Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers," founded last May in Boston, are to take part. At the meetings of the International Council representatives from America, Australia, Belgium, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, India, Italy, Norway, and Sweden are to take part. Among the American delegates, Dr. Samuel Eliot, President of the A.U.A., and the Rev. C. W. Wendte, secretary of the Council, are to be present. And we hear that from France Dr. Réville and Professor Bonet-Maury have already accepted invitations.

THE third of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's series of "Lessons from the New World" is given in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, the subject being "Christ's Reign in America." Having pictured the tremendous pressure of business in such a city as New York, and contrasted with its habits and aims Christ's ideal of humility and promise of rest, Mr. Hargrove shows how much faithful discipleship there yet is in the midst of that life, and as one instance gives the following :—

> In one great city I found a citizen so prominent that before yet I reached it, I had become familiar with his name. He had risen from the very humblest position to be the proprietor of an enormous store, where it was said everything could be had, from a yard of cotton to a steam engine ; he was the leader of the reform party in the place, the owner of one of the principal local journals. But through all his upward career he had gone on with his Christian work. He had been a Sunday scholar as a poor boy, a Sunday-school teacher as he grew and prospered ; in his wealth he was superintendent of his own Sunday-school of (I was told) four thousand scholars. That Sunday-school Jesus of Nazareth had built, and he maintains it. It is a place of his dominion in the midst of the city. Money-making is the business of the place ; money-makers are its inhabitants ; but here money is spent not made ; the workers gain no wage by their labour. It is for his sake they employ their scant leisure hours in teaching ; it is his word and example which prevails with the principal and all his assistants to give and spend without reward.

For us in this country, as in America, Mr. Hargrove adds, the all-important thing is that we should be possessed by the spirit of Jesus, and not on Sunday only, but every day, work for his kingdom of righteousness and peace.

THE Rev. Joseph May, after twenty-five years of service as minister of the First Unitarian Church of Philadelphia, is about to retire, and is succeeded by the Rev. J. H. Ecob, who has been a prominent Congregational minister in Maine, New York and Colerado. It will be remembered that the Philadelphia Church was founded at the close of last century, with the sympathy of Dr. Priestley who was then settled at Northumberland, Penn. The services for some years were conducted by members of the congregation, and then followed the long ministry, extending over fifty years, of the late revered Dr. Furness. To him Mr. May succeeded, and though now retiring from active service, is still to remain as "emeritus minister," one with his people.

THE problem of the "Housing of the Poor" is receiving considerable attention in Liverpool. The recently formed Liverpool Housing Association is carrying on a vigorous propaganda chiefly by means of lectures illustrated with views of some of the slums of the North and South ends of Liverpool, and the wretched court dwellings which have been so characteristic of large portions of the city. These are contrasted with municipal dwellings and with those erected by private benevolence or forethought, at Bournville, Port Sunlight, Aintree, &c. Among the lecturers we notice the name of the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, recently Assistant Missionary to the North-end Domestic Mission. The Association has just issued a neat photographic card descriptive of its work, which declares its objects to be : To promote the erection by the Municipality of healthy and comfortable homes for the people ; special importance being drawn to the necessity of the purchase of land on the outskirts of the city and the provision of cheap transit. The President and two Secretaries are well-known members of the local Socialist bodies. The Treasurer, Mr. John Fraser, is a member of the Church of Humanity. All the Vice-Presidents (4) are Unitarians. Is there any lesson for the future in this combination ? We hear that the latest acquisition by the Society is the new chairman of the Committee of the City Council which deals with the question and which has been renamed. It was the Insanitary Property Committee, now it is the Housing Committee. A change of good omen.

THE new School-Church of the Heaton Moor congregation, Manchester, of which the Rev. Priestley Prime is minister, was opened last Saturday, the preacher being the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. We have not yet received any report of the proceedings.

REFERRING to a statement in the article on the Baptists in THE INQUIRER of Dec. 1, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth writes to say that it was at a meeting at Burnley, June 25, 1891 (and not in the following year), that the union of the Particular Baptists with the New Connexion of General Baptists was effected. And as to the Methodists, dealt with last week, Mr. Brinkworth adds that while Hugh Bourne was one of the founders of Primitive Methodism, William Clowes was another, and he refers to the chapels bearing the name of "Clowes" in Yorkshire and elsewhere.

FIND out your task ; stand to it. All true work is sacred. In all true work, were it but true hand labour, there is something of divineness.—Carlyle.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Treasury of American Sacred Song, edited by the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, received a very warm welcome on both sides of the Atlantic when it was first published in 1896. So rich and beautiful a collection—gathered exclusively from American writers—came as a surprise, not because Longfellow, Whittier, and Lowell were not everywhere known and loved, but because of the number and variety of hitherto little-known singers, and the high excellence of their work. Mr. Horder rendered a great service to his fellow-countrymen when he brought within their reach such treasures out of the heart of the best life of America, and we are delighted that a second enlarged edition is now published, and at a reduced price, which should gain for the book a much wider circulation. Five new authors appear in this second edition, and twenty-eight new poems. Of these the shortest, and not least striking, is the following verse on "The Way," by Henry Van Dyke:—

"Who seeks for heaven alone to save his soul,
May keep the path, but will not reach the goal;
While he who walks in love may wander far,
But God will bring him where the Blessed are."

We are glad also to find the complete text of a poem by Mary G. Brainard, "Not Knowing," which begins:—

"I know not what will befall me; God hangs a mist o'er my eyes," and which we have long been familiar with in an imperfect form. (Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d.)

Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford is the title of an attractive book by the Rev. G. A. Payne, just published. A further notice we must reserve, but mention the book here that these for whom it will have a special interest may know that it is available for Christmas presents. There are a number of good illustrations of Knutsford and the neighbourhood, as well as portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Gaskell. Mr. Payne's book is published with a commendation by Edna Lyall. (Manchester: Clarkson and Griffiths, 160, Deansgate. London: Gay and Bird, 22, Bedford-street. 3s. net.)

Some Papers and Addresses from the Friends' Summer School, Birmingham, September, 1899. This is one of the welcome books we have long had it in mind to notice, and after all must be content with only a very few lines. The earlier volume of papers from the Scarborough Summer School, 1897, naturally led to the hope that so successful and helpful a gathering would be repeated, and the hope has not been disappointed. This volume opens with a picturesque paper by Canon Rawnsley on "A Visit to La Verna," and Pastor Cremer writes on "The Future of Protestantism in France," but the greater part of the volume represents the thought and the inward life of Friends themselves. Thus John W. Graham concludes his study of Isaac Pennington with the words: "We are the purest type in England of the Church mystical and philanthropic, and our call is to abide in our calling." Edward Grubb writes on the "Development of Christian Morality," in modern times, and William C. Braithwaite on the same subject, before the Reformation, and there is a study of Tauler and Boehme by Joan Mary Fry. (Headley Bros. 3s. net.)

The Religious Spirit in the Poets, by the Right Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter, Bishop of Ripon, is the fruit of the bishop's enforced leisure for reading and writing in frequent railway journeys. The papers are collected from the Sunday Magazine, in which they have appeared during the present year. After speaking of the kinship between religion and poetry, literary inspiration, and genuine and superficial religion in poetry, there are brief studies of Spenser, Marlowe's "Faustus," Shakespeare's "Tempest," Milton's "Comus," Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," Tennyson and Browning. For lovers of poetry they make a volume of pleasant reading. (Isbister and Company. 5s.)

Young Days, edited by J. J. Wright, comes as an annual volume in good time for Christmas. Many of our children take it in month by month, but all the rest should be sure to get the bound volume. There is a good story running through the whole year, "Clare Heatherton's Mistake," by Miss Theodora Mills, some charming animal fairy stories by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, and a variety of other short stories, including some special ones for Bands of Hope and Mercy. A series of illustrated articles on "Famous Buildings of the World," and "Heroes of Exploration" help to make up a very good and interesting volume. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. 6d.).

Princess May and her Wonderful Law, by Aunt Amy, the children's play, which we noticed on its appearance in the December number of Young Days, has been separately printed as a booklet in a very dainty cover and gilt edges. It would take a big square envelope, but then would make a pleasant Christmas greeting. (Sunday School Association. 6d.).

The Essex Hall Pocket Almanac for 1901, in its accustomed convenient form, is now ready. Whit-week falls at the end of May, and among the engagements noted is an International Congress of Unitarians to be held in London on the Friday, May 31. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street. 1s. net.).

The Stickit Minister's Wooing and Other Galloway Stories, by S. R. Crockett, is a collection of twenty-two sketches, most of which, if not all, first appeared in the British Weekly, to the editor of which journal and to the late R. L. Stevenson Mr. Crockett acknowledges in his Preface a great debt of gratitude as his first encouragers in literature. "Two Humorists," "Beadle and Martyr," "The Troubler of Israel," "The Blue Eyes of Ailie," and "The Suit of Bottle Green" are among the sketches. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

Church Folk, by Ian Maclaren, is a smaller collection of eleven sketches, which also, we believe, first saw the light in the columns of the British Weekly. "How to Make the Most of a Sermon," "How to Make the Most of Your Minister," Dr. John Watson knows very well, and Ian Maclaren knows how to tell. Here we may also learn about "Genteel Tramps in Our Churches," "The Pew and the Man in it," and "The Revival of a Minister." The book should be read—and doubtless will be—by ministers and people alike. (Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

The Doctrines of Grace, by John Watson, M.A., D.D., deals in successive chapters—which were first published in the Expositor—with the great questions of Christian redemption and ministry. To this book we shall hope to return in a quieter time. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

The Life of Christian Service is a book of devotional thoughts from the writings of the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, Dean of Canterbury, selected and arranged by J. H. Burn, B.D. The purpose seems to be well carried out, and the book will be valued by those who enjoy the Dean's eloquent writings. (Elliot Stock. 5s.)

RELIGION IN BRITAIN DURING THE CENTURY.

THE SCOTTISH PRESBYTERIANS.

To the average Scotsman it will probably seem a somewhat rash enterprise for a raw Southron to attempt to sketch in outline the main features of the history of the Scottish religious movements during the century now drawing to a close; but the recollection that we have to deal with matters of fact rather than matters of opinion, and that things are often seen in truer perspective from a distance than close at hand, encourages one to persevere in the attempt.

In order to understand the modern history of the Scottish Presbyterian Churches two important points should be borne in mind. In the first place, the religious settlement in Scotland in 1690 was, broadly speaking, a comprehensive settlement. It left no strong religious body outside the Established Presbyterian Church. The Episcopal incumbents were allowed to retain their places on easy terms, and a large proportion remained within the newly constituted Church. In England the attempts at comprehension failed. In Scotland comprehension was to have a trial. Here we have the elements for two strong parties within the Church itself.

In the second place, we must remember that during the reactionary reign of Anne the rights of lay patrons were restored by an Act passed by large majorities in both Houses of Parliament. Now the system of patronage is essentially feudal and aristocratic. Presbyterianism is essentially democratic. Sooner or later the two were bound to come into conflict. It was mainly upon questions relating to Patronage that the secessions from the Church of Scotland in the eighteenth century took place. The first under Erskine in 1733 forming the body of Associate Presbyterians, the second under Boston and Gillespie forming in 1761 the Presbytery (afterwards Synod) of Relief. It was the same matter that led to the Disruption of the Church of Scotland in the nineteenth century.

Evangelicals and Moderates.

The revival of religion in England reacted upon Scotland and strengthened the hands of the popular or evangelical party within her Church. The Moderates, characterised by a tolerant and intellectual temper, had been in the ascendant during the eighteenth century, and even at its close were the stronger party. When an "Overture" in favour of Foreign Missions came before the General Assembly in 1796, they rejected it. When the rising Sunday-school movement sought recognition, they declined to give it countenance, and rebuked all unauthorised teachers in a severe "Pastoral Admonition" in 1799.

But with the opening years of the new century a different spirit began to be shown. The Evangelicals grew in power, and many Moderates manifested a quickened sense of their responsibilities. The new feeling was shown by the fervour with which Scotland repudiated the Apocrypha, and by the more important work of bringing the gospel and a knowledge of letters to the people of the Highlands in the Gaelic tongue.

Missions.

The rebuff given by the Assembly in 1796 was powerless to extinguish the rising interest in Foreign Missions. Missionary Societies, independent of the Church, were quickly founded. The Church of Scotland, however, in 1824, reversed her policy on this matter, and took a nobler course. On the initiative of Dr. Inglis, the Scottish Church herself founded a Foreign Mission, which was happy both in its method and in the man chosen to direct it. It combined preaching the Gospel with the imparting of a thoroughly sound education, and under the fostering care of Dr. Duff proved most fruitful. Attention was soon given to the need for Home Missionary work. The increase of population and the growth of towns rendered some re-adjustment of the old parochial system imperative in many quarters. Numbers of people were untouched by the ministrations of religion. The evangelical party pressed the matter upon the attention of the Assembly. Thomas Chalmers (1780-1847) had demonstrated in the Tron parish at Glasgow, what could be done by personal influence and visitation, and the Assembly called him, in 1834, to take in hand the matter of Church Extension. For a hundred years before 1834 the Church of Scotland had opened some sixty chapels (those who had left her had opened ten times as many); but now the Church herself took up the work, and in four years, owing mainly to the enthusiastic labours of Chalmers, 187 chapels were built. For these the Church claimed endowment from the State, and she boldly admitted the ministers of these new parishes to seats in the Assembly on its own motion, without reference to the Civil power. This helped to bring still more prominently to the front the question of the relation between Church and State which was already being agitated in reference to the important matter of Patronage.

The Disruption.

The spirit of Reform and the growing sense of power amongst the people had their effect in ecclesiastical as well as in political affairs. Parishioners began to demand more loudly than before some voice in the selection of those who were to minister to them. Overtures on the subject poured into the Assembly. Even Moderates made suggestions for reform; as for the Evangelicals, they were ready for drastic measures. At the suggestion of Chalmers, and on the motion of Lord Moncreiff, the Assembly took the matter into its own hands in 1834, and passed the Veto Act. They did not see the necessity for persuading the Civil power to alter the existing law. They asserted the principle of the "Spiritual Independence" of the Church. The Veto Act declared that the disapproval of a majority of the male heads of families, being communicants, should be deemed sufficient ground for the presbytery to reject the person presented by a patron. It was not considered necessary to state the reasons of disapproval; a dumb dissent of the majority was to bar the presentee from entrance to his living. It was not long before the legality of this Act was tested. In the Auchterarder case the Civil Court laid it down that it was illegal for a Presbytery to reject a duly presented probationer, without trial of his qualifications. The House of Lords sustained the judgment of the Court of Session. It was held that the Act of 1712 revived the Act of 1592, by which the Presbytery was "bound and astricted to receive whatsomever qualified minister presented by his Majesty or other laic persons." The agitation against the intrusion of ministers upon unwilling parishes and in favour of the spiritual independence of the Church now waxed hot. The whole country rang with the controversy. The popular party had the ablest leaders. Chalmers and Robert Smith Candlish (1806-1873) guided the movement with great judgment. The attempts to get some alteration in the law were clumsily made, and proved futile. In November, 1842, a meeting of ministers, known as the Convocation, was called to determine the line of policy to be followed in the event of not obtaining relief. In January, 1843, the Claim of Right in which the Assembly asserted the absolute independence of the Church of Scotland in spiritual matters was rejected by the Government. In the same month the Court of Session declared that the Church courts had no power to create new quoad sacra parishes. The issue was now clear. The General Assembly met in Edinburgh on May 18, 1843, in the church of St. Andrew. Dr. Welsh, the outgoing Moderator, read a protest at the opening of the proceedings, then quitted the chair and walked out of the Assembly, followed by some 450 ministers. They straightway formed the Free Church of Scotland and elected Chalmers as first Moderator. It was a triumph of principle. The Established Church was greatly weakened by this disruption; but it has since been purged of the abuses of patronage, and has in recent years gained in weight and influence.

Movements for Union.

The presence of a fresh and strong voluntary church in the land led the older voluntary churches in Scotland to think of consolidation and union. There were no differences in doctrine to bar the way to junction, and in 1847 a union was effected between the Associate Presbyterians (known since 1820 as the United Secession Church) and the Synod of Relief, the joint body taking the name of the United Presbyterian Church. Proposals for union between this United Church and the Free Church of Scotland were made in 1863, and negotiations were carried on for ten years, but without avail. The United Presbyterians were ready for union, but the Free Church was not yet wholly ready to rank itself with the older "Voluntaries." Her members had come out from the Established Church of Scotland, saying "We are no Voluntaries," and themselves advocating an established, though spiritually independent church. It took time for the logic of facts to eliminate the feeling thus expressed. The proposal for union was recently renewed with better hopes of success. And the union was happily consummated on Wednesday, Oct. 31, 1900, in the Waverley Market, Edinburgh. The names of the two contracting churches have been happily blended. Joined as one they will henceforth be known as "The United Free Church."*

The Laity.

The churches in Scotland have been

* The "Free Church" had already been joined in 1852 by a majority (twenty-seven ministers) of the Associate Synod of Original Seceders, and in 1876, the bulk of the Reformed Presbyterians (Cameronians) united with her. Another recent instance of church union in Scotland is that of the Congregational with the Evangelical Union Churches, but that is outside Presbyterianism.

happy in the ability, earnestness, and liberality of their leading laymen. In the early part of the century the Haldanes greatly strenghtened the evangelical party in the Church, and set a notable example of unselfish devotion to the cause of religion. The munificence of Mr. James Baird, and later of Lord Gifford, has done a great work for the thorough study of religion, by means of the establishment of Lectureships, in connection with the Scottish Universities, on matters of religion. By the terms of Lord Gifford's will his bequest was for "promoting, advancing, teaching, and diffusing the study of Natural Theology in the widest sense of that term." . . . "I wish the lecturers," he says, "to treat their subject as a strictly natural science, the greatest of all possible sciences, indeed, in one sense the only science, that of Infinite Being without reference to or reliance upon any supposed special, exceptional, or so-called miraculous revelation."

Conclusion.

Though there has been a manifest broadening of religious thought in Scotland during the century, there has been no strong movement for the formation of a separate church avowedly liberal in doctrine. Nor does there seem to have been any large measure of unrest at the continued imposition of the Westminster Standards upon the ministry by the Presbyterian Churches. In the latter half of the eighteenth century there was an earnest endeavour made by many in Scotland to abolish subscription to the Confession of Faith and Formula. In that particular the ministry of the eighteenth century seems to compare favourably with that of the nineteenth. As regards the conduct of worship, church architecture, and church praise, we are assured that the present practice amongst all sections of the Scottish Presbyterians shows an immense improvement upon that which was in vogue at the opening of the century.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Had there been no Presbyterian Church in Scotland, the Presbyterian Church of England, as we now know it, would never have come into being. The story of the rise, the consolidation, the organisation and the progress of that Church forms one of the most remarkable chapters in the religious history of the century. Though this Church, as now existing, was not constituted till 1876, its roots run further back. Two main streams united to form it, and these may be readily traced.

(1) The Scottish Secession Churches, which stood for the purely "Voluntary" principle, planted a few congregations in England in the eighteenth century. In 1820 they were strong enough to set up presbyteries in Newcastle and London and a few years later (1831) in Lancashire. The Union of the Secession Churches with the Relief Synod in Scotland in 1847 gave fresh impetus to the cause in England, and in 1867 the United Presbyterian Church found it desirable to form a separate English Synod for the hundred congregations, in connection with that Church, situated south of the Tweed.

(2) The Evangelical revival in the Established Church of Scotland was not without effect on Scotsmen residing in South Britain. As a result, Scottish congregations were gathered in several of the larger commercial towns of England during the third and fourth decades of the century. These churches were not ashamed of their origin; in fact, they petitioned to be incorporated with the Church of Scotland and desired to be represented in the Scottish General Assembly. This was going a little too far. The Church of Scotland might venture to carve out fresh parishes in its own country and give their ministers seats in the Assembly, but it clearly had no jurisdiction in England. The General Assembly advised these churches, therefore, to form a Synod of their own. Accordingly the Lancashire Presbytery and the Presbytery of N.W. England joined in 1836 in forming a Synod. Three years later the old Scots' Presbytery (c. 1760) of London and the presbytery of Newcastle joined this same Synod, and it was then called "The Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England, in connection with the Church of Scotland." The sympathies of these churches were with Chalmers and the Free Church in their great struggle for spiritual independence. Accordingly, the last clause of the title was dropped in 1849, and the church was thus known as "The Presbyterian Church in England." By the adhesion of the presbyteries of Northumberland, several of the old Protestant dissenting congregations of the extreme North were drawn into communion with this church. By their proximity to Scotland, these English dissenting congregations had naturally been influenced by religious movements across the border. They were not strong enough, however, to impress any distinctively English character upon the church with which they now threw in their lot, nor were they able to materially affect the course of its development.

Union.

There thus came to be two Synods on English soil. The Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England and the English Synod of the United Presbyterian Church. In 1876 a junction between these two Synods was effected at Liverpool, and the new name, "Presbyterian Church of England," was adopted. This church is well organised. It secures an adequate stipend for all its ministers by means of a Sustentation Fund, and also makes provision for their widows and orphans. There are now 318 congregations grouped in twelve presbyteries, and the church is actively extending the field of its labours. It maintains successful missions in China and India. It has built and equipped Westminster College (1899) in Cambridge, and while other denominations complain of a dearth of divinity students, it records an increase. Its "Book of Order," which is a fearful and wonderful example of the extraordinary formality of Scottish procedure, is now in process of revision by one of the Synodical Committees, and there are other indications of a desire to minimise the extent of the Scottish element contained within this church. If there is sufficient elasticity in this body to provide for a natural development in theology, as well as for a revision of procedure, then it should have a brilliant future before it. Up to now, however, it has elected to stand by the Westminster Confession and Catechisms. Any modification effected in doctrine has been made in spite of these standards and not with the hearty recognition and glad concurrence of the Church itself.

WALTER H. BURGESS.

DR. P. T. FORSYTH ON THE UNITARIANISM OF DR. MARTINEAU.

III.

AND now it becomes self-evident why Dr. Martineau warmly embraced this view of the self-revealing presence of God in all human souls, and rejected Dr. Forsyth's conception of the Trinity. The reason was that the former conception of God and of His relation to mankind is being daily and hourly verified by the actual experience of religious minds, and thus is attested and authenticated by actual spiritual discernment, while Dr. Forsyth's conception of a unity of three mutually interpenetrating personalities finds no response and verification in the moral and religious experience of any one, and has to be based entirely on an outgrown external conception of Revelation—a conception which represents the Eternal as revealing Himself to mankind at a certain past time in a form entirely different from that in which He now reveals Himself in every rational and religious soul. Throughout the whole of Dr. Forsyth's paper not the slightest explanation is given of the fact, so utterly astounding if, as he alleges, the personality of Jesus was wholly identical with the personality of God, that the Jesus of the Synoptics appears to have been wholly unaware of the unique and essential function which he was himself constantly exercising in the economy of the Godhead. To us it seems absolutely incredible that when Jesus uttered the immortal truth, "the pure in heart shall see God," or when he urged his disciples to go into their closets "and pray to the Father who seeth in secret," he either did not know, or, if knowing, deliberately concealed the alleged fact that it was only through his special personal intervention, as a member of a threefold Divine Society, that this spiritual insight and spiritual communion with the Father could possibly be realised.

It must not, however, be supposed for a moment that the invaluable mediating influence between God and man which is being daily exercised by the divinest spirits in the present and in the past, and pre-eminently by the words and character of the man Christ Jesus, was not most fully recognised by Dr. Martineau. Whatever may have been the case with some of the earlier Unitarians, who were strongly influenced by Deistic ideas, Dr. Martineau realised as vividly as any orthodox Trinitarian could do that God is no mere abstract unity reached by a process of philosophic thought, but is the most concrete of all realities—a Personality present and self-revealing in all truly spiritual men. No one was more aware than he was that the character of the Eternal Father is then most vividly discerned, and evokes the most passionate adoration and love and the completest trust when it is seen revealed in transcendent purity and fulness in prophetic souls. It is, no doubt, profoundly true that when God is conceived as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" the vision of Him is immensely more inspiring and more satisfying, than when we see Him simply as manifested in the poorer ideals of our less spiritual natures.

But while Dr. Martineau insisted on the reality and priceless value of the mediating work of God's self-revelation in Jesus, he also held, and in our view most justly, that the true end and divine purpose of all such mediation is to bring the worshipping soul into direct and immediately felt relationship with the indwelling God, and that in the supreme moments of the soul's deepest intimacy with the Father within it, the mediating influences have done their part, and passing for the time out of the thought, leave the praying and adoring soul to the unspeakable peace and joy of immediate personal communion with the Absolute and Eternal Spirit. Even in the case of those devout souls who direct their prayers to Christ, we feel confident that, in their moments of deepest devotion and communion, Christ is felt by them as identical with God, and in no way as a mediator between them and the supreme object of their trust and devotion. Most sweet and indeed indispensable for rich and full religious life are the mediating ministrations of all God-inspired souls, but we must still say with the poet:—

> 'Tis sweeter far, when thou art found
> The soul's own sense of God!

As then actual spiritual experience affords no evidence of the existence of a particular personality in the Deity acting as a mediator between the human soul and the entire Godhead, we naturally inquire for the philosophical and psychological reasons by which Dr. Forsyth supports his advocacy of this dogma of a triple society in God. After reading and re-reading his article we can find therein only two reasons which have a semblance of validity, and they are both comprised in the following sentence:—

> If God's demand on man be the reflection of God's demand on Himself; if man's sacrifice of himself to God do but correspond to a real sacrifice, within God, of Son to Father; if the authority over us be but the congenial control of entire Godhead over one of its persons or elements; if the divine unity be not the theistic unity of a person, but a richer unity of persons—then we have a basis for moral authority which does not make it one thing for God and another for man.

In other words, Dr. Forsyth's contention is, that it is only through the conception of God as embracing three personalities that we are enabled to understand and realise, (1) that God actually sacrifices Himself and suffers for the sake of humanity, and (2) that God feels the sense of moral obligation just as much as man feels it.

At this question of the possible existence of self-sacrifice and suffering in God we have already glanced. It is to be particularly noted that both of these alleged special insights afforded by the Trinitarian view of the Godhead concern the subjective or inner side of the absolute personality of God; and, as we have before said, we have, and can have, no direct spiritual insight into this inward self-consciousness of the Eternal. All assertions like the above, therefore, stand on an entirely different footing from the assurance which we have of God's approval, sympathy, and support; for this assurance rests on actual spiritual experiences which we feel to involve and justify this conviction of God's personal immanence in, and action upon, our self-conscious life. But of the existence in God of self-sacrifice and suffering we cannot have this conclusive evidence. Only to the Eternal Himself can this side of His essential nature lie clearly open; and whatever speculative views we may individually hold on this question, they can only be more or less probable presumptions based on what we know of the character of God as it is revealed to us in our highest ideals and in our consciousness of personal communion with Him. And, it may be added, that in all such attempts to describe and define the nature of the self-consciousness of the universal indwelling Spirit, we necessarily incur the risk of imposing the limiting anthropomorphic conceptions of our finite and dependent minds upon the absolute personality of the Self-existent One. Of course if Dr. Forsyth's stupendous assumption, that God was not in the personality of Jesus but was the personality, could be conclusively proved to be true, and it could be also shown that this wholly exceptional personality felt and suffered exactly as human beings do, we should know something very positive about the inner life of God; but we should at the same time have an idea of that life so definitely anthropomorphic, that it is very doubtful whether it would have for us any real ethical and spiritual worth. The moment, however, we attempt rationally to realise this alleged identity of the consciousness of Jesus with the consciousness of God we find that we are attempting an absolutely impossible task, and a task, too, which, if successfully achieved, would transform the inspired words of Jesus, "I am not alone for the Father is with me," into a wholly inaccurate and misleading account of his actual relations with the Father within him. Nor does it appear to us conceivable that when Jesus uttered the words, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me," the physical and mental anguish which extorted this cry could have been absolutely identical in Jesus and in God.

If, then, as the divine reason within us compels us to do, we in thought restore Jesus to that essential brotherhood with his fellow-men from which Dr. Forsyth has, as we think, unnaturally and irrationally wrenched him, and ask ourselves seriously what ground we have for cherishing the idea that self-sacrifice and suffering are experienced by the Eternal Father, a sound philosophy of religion appears to us to afford, not indeed demonstration, but some suggestive light in two directions. First, as we think of the immanence in every living thing of Him whom we most adequately conceive as Perfect Love, we have an instinctive tendency to believe that in all suffering He is not a knower merely, but in some real, but by us indefinable, sense a participator also; and that, therefore, there is some reality in the essential nature of the Eternal corresponding to the words of William Blake:—

> He doth give His joy to all:
> He becomes an Infant small,
> He becomes a Man of Woe,
> He doth feel the sorrow too.

It may well be, however, that the participation of the Supreme Being in the sufferings of His irrational creatures may be adequately described as "sympathy"; for it is not conceivable that He feels their pains simply as the sufferers themselves do. There is, however, another direction of philosophical and religious thought which lends, we incline to think (though we are not quite sure that here we should have Dr. Martineau's complete concurrence) to a more firmly grounded presumption of the indwelling God's deeper participation in certain of the trials and sufferings of His rational offspring. In the higher reaches of our rational, moral, and spiritual nature, where we rise above all that is individual and particular, and apprehend in some measure the Universal and the Absolute, the eternal life of God appears to so flow into and in a manner blend with the individual consciousness of the philosopher, the prophet, and the saint, that a more or less assured conviction at once arises that both the joyful and the painful experiences of these divinest sons of God are in a very real sense also the experiences of the Eternal Father; and that He, whose indwelling personal presence prompts the transcendent idea and the heroic self-sacrifice, is in such complete unity and sympathy with the spirits He inspires that their sufferings and their joys are, in a certain real sense, His sufferings and joys also. And thus it appears to us that, without resorting to Dr. Forsyth's wholly inadmissible transmutation of the divinest of the rational children of the Eternal Father into a wholly exceptional and abnormal Son of God, we may still find in the highest experiences of human nature some substantial ground for an assurance, such as was evidently cherished by Paul and the early Christians, that human self-sacrifice of the diviner sort is not without its eternal counterpart in God.

And now to turn to the second feature in the Divine self-consciousness which Dr. Forsyth contends can only be made intelligible and rational by the assumption that Jesus was the second personality in a tri-une Godhead—i.e., God's consciousness of moral obligation. In the first place, the obvious reply to this is, that there appears to be no good reason to think that the Absolute and Eternal One does feel moral obligation as man feels it. We feel it because God is immanent in our inner life, and the ideals which He inspires are intuitively felt to be in us, but not of us—to be, in a measure, the manifestation in us of what pertains to God's eternal essence, and therefore speaks to us in the absolute tone of the Categorical Imperative. But in the Supreme Being what is ideal to us is externally real and, therefore, as it seems to us, He is righteous in all His ways simply because Righteousness and Love belong to the eternal essence of His being. He knows fully what moral obligation is, because His eternal self-consciousness includes exhaustive knowledge of the consciousnesses of men, but, so far as we can see, there is no ground for asserting that He feels moral obligation in the way in which we feel it. And there is this further objection to Dr. Forsyth's theory that, notwithstanding his ingenious dealing with the three personalities in the Godhead, he does not really succeed in showing that the sentiment of moral obligation in the Deity is the same as it is in us. In his representation of the matter it is only the second person in the Trinity who feels moral obligation as man feels it. The second person, we are told, feels moral obligation to obey the behests of the Godhead as a whole; but as the entire Godhead imposes obligation and can have no moral obligation imposed on it, it follows that the second person in his capacity as an integral element in God can himself feel no obligation; and hence he must have simultaneously the consciousness of feeling moral obligation and of not feeling it. Unless, then, Dr. Forsyth can point to something analogous to this in our inner life, it is idle for him to pretend that even on his own theory of the Godhead moral obligation is the same thing in God as it is in man.

In conclusion, we will recall the attention of our readers to some of the chief points in our reply to Dr. Forsyth. We maintain then, in the first place, that he has altogether failed to show that the new universalism and the new sociology (to the inadequate apprehension of which he ascribes the lamentable shortcomings of Dr. Martineau's ethical individualism and theological Unitarianism) lend any real support to his dogma of a society of three personalities in the Godhead. Nay, we will go further and express a confident opinion that if he really wishes to keep alive as long as possible the rapidly declining dogma of three persons in the Godhead, he will gain his end more effectually by leaving the "new universalism" severely alone. For, what is it he has borrowed from this new way of thinking? From some of the more extreme of these new universalists he has borrowed two doctrines, both of which Dr. Martineau, after careful examination, deliberately rejected. One of these is the notion that the individual man is nothing more than an abstraction by human thought from a real entity or unity called "the social organism" or "collective humanity"; and he contends that by realising this conception of the individual's relation to society, we shall gain a satisfactory clue to the understanding of the relation of the three separate personalities in the Godhead to the Godhead as a whole. In reply to this we have urged that neither sound philosophy nor Christianity at all sanctions this estimate of the individual man; and that the real relation of man to society furnishes neither illustration nor confirmation of the dogma of a tri-une God. The other principle, which he has taken from certain of the new universalists, is the conception of the Self, or Ego, "as a great tangle of mixed motives"—a conception which, as we have pointed out, disposes of the very possibility and conceivability of any real freedom of moral choice between possible alternatives, and thus undermines the truth to which we feel sure Jesus attached supreme importance—that sin is only real and reprehensible in the view of the indwelling Father when, and in so far as, it was possible for the sinner to have left it uncommitted.

But, as we have indicated above, there are other elements in the new universalism with which Dr. Martineau was in partial sympathy, and which are, in our view, most helpful and valuable in aiding us to form an adequate conception of evolution, and also of God's immanence in Nature and of His constant presence and self-revelation in the minds and hearts of men. But while this most important side of recent scientific and philosophical thought does not support in the slightest degree the dogma of the existence of three co-equal personalities in the Godhead, it does lend ground and powerful support to the Christian idea that in the all-embracing sweep of God's Absolute Personality, all dependent personalities live and move and have their being; and that as Dean Sabatier well says, "God is the place where spirits blend, and in rising towards Him man of necessity passes beyond the limits of his own individuality." This is just equivalent to Dr. Martineau's idea when he says that man must be, in a sense, infinite, for only an infinite being could know infinity. It is utterly in vain, then, that Dr. Forsyth invokes the genius of the new universalism to bless his idea of a triple Divine society. The new universalists do not, indeed, curse his ancient dogma, but they do treat it almost with contempt, as a moribund theological conception which has done good service in its time, but which is now being replaced by a far more adequate conception of God and His relation to the world and to humanity.

And in the case of those of the new universalists who are most interested in religion, it is certainly not towards Dr. Forsyth's Trinity that their warmest sympathies flow, but rather towards that modernised Sabellian conception of the Godhead which, as we have seen, is held in common by Dr. Martineau and by Dr. Rashdall, as well as by an increasing number of thoughtful preachers and thinkers in all religious denominations—a conception which recognises the immanent presence and activity of God in every phase of Nature, and His personal incarnation and self-revelation in varying degrees of purity and fulness in all minds and hearts—a conception, therefore, which at length restores to the Christian religion that universal character which it presents in the Sermon on the Mount, and so fits it to endorse, appropriate, and unify what is deepest and truest in all the living religions of the world.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE HELPER.*

THE first three annual volumes of "The Helper," edited by Miss Marian Pritchard, have set a high standard of excellence, which is fully maintained by the new volume, which Mr. Tarrant has edited. It contains abundant material for good teaching in school and home, and much else for the instruction and encouragement of teachers. Facing the opening address, which is by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, there are some verses by the editor, "The Labourer's Hymn," of which the first two are as follows:—

"Go work in My vineyard, My garden and field,
And bring Me the fruits and the flowers they yield."
—The voice of the Master the labourers heard,
And into His harvest they went at His word.

The fathers belovèd, the reapers of yore,
Have brought home their sheaves, and their labour is o'er;
But lo! as He calleth the weary to sleep,
New harvests arise and new harvesters reap.

Mr. Armstrong's address is on "Sunday-school Teachers I have known," and gives some delightful pictures of teachers who had not much learning, but by a beautiful personal influence did a true and lasting work.

All these reminiscences I have called up, not to deprecate that intelligent and well-informed teaching which our Sunday School Association has so wonderfully promoted in our midst by its splendid publications, but to remind us that personality and character count for most of all. That very personality and character will, indeed, lead the true teacher to equip himself to the very best he can, and to carry to the class a mind as well stored as time, talent, and education may permit. But there will always be some teachers who can make little headway even with the best manuals of Bible or Church history. I want superintendents to feel that these also may have their functions; and, above all, I want them to feel themselves that, if they are faithfully doing their best with love in their hearts, it is well, and the Great Superintendent who reads all hearts will have His "Well done!" for them at the last.

But it is not only such humbly equipped teachers of whom Mr. Armstrong writes, and it is indeed a fitting prelude to such a volume, which contains his picture of Mrs. Henry Turner, of Nottingham, Mr. William Enfield of the same town, and another honoured, though unnamed teacher in Liverpool.

Mindful of the thousandth anniversary of the death of Alfred the Great, Miss F. E. Cooke writes for the children an interesting paper on his life, and the volume has for frontispiece a picture of a fine statue of the King.

There are several good series of lessons, the editor himself making the most substantial contribution in sixteen lessons on the later history of Israel "From Josiah to Jesus," with an admirable introduction as to the importance of historical teaching and the means for making a clear impression on the children's minds. The other biblical lessons are eight on "Bible Homes," by the Rev. J. Ruddle, and five on "Some Churches of the New Testament," by the Rev. A. Harvie; and Mr. Lucking Tavener contributes a series of "Nature Lessons from Ruskin," which are beautifully illustrated by some full-page plates and other smaller pictures. Mr. Robinson's delightful paper on "My Pond" is also illustrated by three plates, showing some of the insects which haunt it.

One of the most helpful papers is entitled "Parental Help in Religious Training," with two lessons, on "The Presence of God" and "The Great Choice." In the introduction the writer, "I.M.R.," says:—

A religion that is only spoken of on Sundays, and called "Divinity" at school, will not have much effect on the daily life when childhood has once been left behind. I believe most parents share a deep longing to give their sons and daughters some guiding thought that shall help them in the trials and temptations that must come to all of us, and I would say to all parents:—Let your child learn from your own daily life that we are always in the presence of God, and that only wrong-doing can shadow its brightness for us; and when he is old he will not depart from what you taught him as a little child.

A new year's address by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, papers by the Revs. C. Roper, Frank Walters, Felix Taylor, and Mr. Ion Pritchard, a series of papers on American, Welsh, Scottish, Irish and French Sunday-schools, and five papers from this year's Oxford Summer Session go to make up the full contents of the volume; and still we have not named them all. It will thus be seen that it is a "Helper" indeed, worthy of its name.

OBITUARY.

JAMES LAMPORT THORNELY.

AFTER a short illness Mr. J. L. Thornely died at his home in Liverpool from typhoid, on Dec. 5, at the early age of thirty-five. Two years ago, on the death of his father, the late James Thornely, who for a long period had been the sympathetic and efficient secretary to the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, he succeeded to that office, discharging its duties in the same spirit that had won for his father the respect and gratitude of a large number of the ministers of our Free Churches. A solicitor by profession, Mr. J. L. Thornely was a man of refined culture and considerable literary ability. He published "Stanley: a Drama," "Moments Apart: A Miscellany of Verse," and an interesting work on the "Monumental Brasses of Lancashire and Cheshire." Few men are so well acquainted as he was with the history of Nonconformity, more especially with the history of the congregations connected with our own household of faith in the Liverpool district. His latest literary production was an "Historical Sketch of Gateacre Chapel," read at the bi-centenary celebration on Oct. 15. Gateacre Chapel was the religious home of his earlier years. He was keenly interested in the welfare of that ancient place of worship, and acted as secretary to the Trustees. For some time, however, he had been an attendant at Ullet-road Church, and the Rev. Dr. Klein conducted the service at the Anfield Crematorium on Dec. 7. Besides members of the family, the service was attended by a numerous company, which included several ministers and leading Unitarian laymen, anxious to pay a last tribute of affection and respect to an accomplished, gentle, and amiable friend.

PEACE.

WITH eager heart and will on fire,
I fought to win my great desire;
"Peace shall be mine," I said; but life
Grew bitter in the weary strife.

My soul was tired, and my pride
Was wounded deep: to Heaven I cried,
"God grant me peace or I must die;"
The dumb stars glittered no reply.

Broken at last, I bowed my head,
Forgetting all myself, and said,
"Whatever comes, His will be done;"
And in that moment peace was won.

IN the effort to appreciate various forms of goodness let us not underestimate the value of a simply good life. Just to be good, to keep life pure from degrading elements, to make it constantly helpful in little ways to those who are touched by it, to keep one's spirit always sweet and avoid all manner of petty anger and irritation and to seek to be true to our best insight, to express in the personal life the noblest ideal we know, is the highest possible service in the problem of social reconstruction.—*E. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

For Christmas-time.

THERE is a story which tells how, one day, in the middle of winter, a Swiss peasant set out to walk to a village some miles distant from his home. His way led him by a rough road among the hills. When he began his journey the sun was shining, and the sprinkling of untrodden snow all round him was dazzling to the sight. But, in course of time, clouds collected and flakes of snow began to fall. They fell thicker and thicker, and the neighbouring mountain peaks were soon hidden in the gathering storm. Down came the heavy snow covering the rocks with a thick white mantle. The traveller began to stumble, for his feet were growing very cold. He could hardly drag himself along. He had a strange, numb feeling in his arms, and a longing to lie down and sleep came upon him. He was just about to let himself fall into the soft bed of snow at the road-side when his foot struck against a heap lying across his path. He had still sense enough left to see that the object in his way bore the shape of a human body.

The traveller was so startled by this discovery that in a moment his dulled brain woke up. Stooping down, he managed to push away some of the snow, and found a man lying unconscious on the ground. Making a mighty effort, he lifted the helpless form against a rock close at hand, and the warm blood flowed back into his own hands as he rubbed the half-frozen chest and limbs. Soon, by the exertions he made, his whole frame was in a glow; he had no longer a longing to lie down and sleep to death. The end of the story is that both men were saved. Our traveller, by helping another, helped himself.

Now there is something we should all remember which is very true and beautiful, which this story helps to teach us. God has placed us in the world to be helpers of one another. We are all, as it were, bound together, the children of one Heavenly Father; and He has made it part of the nature which He has given us that we find happiness when we forget ourselves in loving and helping others, and are most miserable when we are most selfish. Have you ever noticed that the children who have sunny, happy-looking faces are the children who do not think about themselves and what they want, but are always ready to give way and be kind to their companions? God has willed that every kind deed we do and every kind word we speak makes our own natures sweeter and sunnier, and it is the state of mind within us—what we are ourselves, not what we have—that makes our real happiness.

I read the other day of a boy who was rushing off to school. With a whoop like a wild Indian, he sprang down the steps and tore along the street. Suddenly he stopped, thought for a moment, and then turned back quite a long distance, as fast as he could go, to where a slippery banana skin, which in his hurry he had passed, lay on the ground. He picked it up and threw it into a refuse barrel, and was overheard to say "some one might have slipped on it." Then off he went again, running faster than ever to make up for lost time. This was only a little thing to do, but does it not show that that boy was always on the watch to help?

One more story, about a lotus-pond.* I am going to shorten it a little, and tell it in my own words. It seems to picture to us how beautiful life is when we are trying to be kind and helpful to each other.

There it lay, the beautiful pond on which lotus-flowers floated like water-lilies, and on its banks bloomed roses among which bees hummed contentedly all day long. Around it was a large garden, in parts bright with sunshine and flowers, partly sheltered by trees in whose branches birds sang their happy songs. Out of the pond flowed a stream of pure water. It wound through the neighbouring fields and kept them fresh and green, and slaked the thirst of all the living creatures round about. Happy children came to play in that garden, and tired men and women to rest and enjoy the beautiful sights and sounds, for there was a notice-board put up on which were the words: "All are welcome to the lotus-pond." Even the sheep and cattle in the fields used to come to the fence to look, as if they, too, found pleasure in the place. It was very plain that the owner of the garden loved his fellow-creatures, and wanted to help them.

But, in course of time, the place fell into other hands. The new owner thought only of himself, and had no wish to welcome others to his grounds. He pulled down the notice-board, and shut off the water that flowed from the hills into his pond. Then the pond and the stream dried up; the flowers died; there were no longer humming bees and singing birds; the fields were parched, and the cattle were thirsty. The story is a parable; it means that beauty and happiness go out of life when people cease to love and help each other.

Once more Christmas-time is here, and many children are thinking joyfully of all the happiness it brings with it. There are holidays, and exchanges of presents, and merry-making, and much enjoyment for many of you. That is all true; but we cannot forget that there are many children who have none of these Christmas joys, and if we have kind hearts this thought will bring a touch of sadness now and then to us in the midst of all our pleasure.

Let me tell you what I think it is that has given to Christmas this character of being such a happy season. Is it not because at Christmas-time there is a spirit of loving helpfulness abroad? Hearts are opened, and we not only say the old words "Merry Christmas" to each other; but we know that good wishes are circulating on every side and that then, if ever, kind deeds and thoughts and words make the world beautiful. Shall we not try and carry the Christmas spirit of goodwill and sunny-hearted helpfulness with us all the year round?

DOCTRINE AND LIFE.

WHEN we look back upon the century now almost ended, and trace the history of our own religious community, we cannot fail to be impressed by the succession of noble men who in one generation after another have been devoted to the service of our churches. It has been a century of astonishing progress in the realm both of physical achievement and of knowledge; there has been great movement of thought, and the problems of one generation in the matter of religious faith have not been the same as those of another. But throughout these hundred years, while methods of thought have differed and the stress of controversy has shifted from one point to another, there has been one steadfast spirit which has dominated those to whom we look as our teachers and the leaders of our religious life.

The Unitarianism which has prevailed in our Free Churches throughout the century has not been one fixed scheme of thought, it has grown with growing thought and deepening spiritual insight; but from first to last it has been the outcome of one steadfast spirit—the spirit of sincerity in religion, loyal to truth, with freedom to follow wherever it might lead, bent above all on understanding the truth of the Christian Gospel and making its power felt for the uplifting of mankind and the welfare of the world. From one point of view it may be said that it has been for us a century of Unitarian controversy, and unfriendly critics have been apt to put this down to pride of intellect, shallowness of religious life, and love of contention. Some there have been among us, doubtless, who were open to that reproach, but so there were on the other side; and when we call to mind the men who in one generation after another have been the chief among our controversialists, and at the same time the saints of our communion, we know how unjust and contrary to fact it is, to seek to stamp our whole religious movement with such a character.

We recall the memory of that venerable confessor, THEOPHILUS LINDSEY, whose long life extended into our century, and who in establishing his Unitarian chapel in Essex-street, in the very act of making that most emphatic protest, took for the text of his first sermon the exhortation "to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." As LINDSEY passed away, LANT CARPENTER was beginning to make his power felt at Exeter, and not long afterwards at Bristol; and the year before he died, JAMES MARTINEAU and JOHN HAMILTON THOM had done their great work in the Liverpool Unitarian controversy. They were young men then, but for the rest of the century, almost to the end, they remained the representatives of the best spirit of our religious life, always staunch in their witness to the truth, exponents of an unhesitating Unitarianism, and yet of the broadest Christian sympathies and the profoundest humility, reverence, and piety.

This same spirit, which we see in our chief teachers, has been manifested in many a humble place, in the simple piety of the unlearned, in single-hearted integrity and steadfast witness to unpopular truth. It is not for the sake of controversy, or in the pride of intellect, that Unitarianism has been maintained before the world and cherished in our churches, where their life is seen at its best, but for the sake of opening the way for truer and more genuine religious life. Thus our earlier and later teachers, each by the method of their own time, have sought to make clearer the simplicity of JESUS, the true spirit of a humble discipleship, and the reality of the FATHER'S love and sustaining presence in our life. The Unitarianism of our churches, in its inward and vital meaning, has been a fresh and living interpretation of the Christian Gospel, with a determination that truth should prevail, and with the endeavour to make religion and life one and the same thing.

As to the dangers of controversy and over much attention to the intellectual aspect of religion, we have had abundant opportunity to take warning. Faults and mistakes of the past may be left behind. The struggles of a long century and the noble and gracious lives which have illuminated its course, have laid for us a firm foundation, and have made clear the right direction for our efforts in the coming time. In freedom we are called to serve the living GOD, to have faith in the enlightenment of His truth, and by the grace of His helpful Spirit to live out our own best life. As we are attentive to the Truth teaching inwardly we come to know this as the Christian life, and we are enriched and strengthened by a spirit of loyal discipleship and the blessedness of a true communion of the seen and the unseen.

Our Unitarianism demands freedom, that we may be completely given up to GOD. As to where He will lead us, what He will teach us, what work He will give us to do, we need have no fear.

A CENTURY OF UNITARIANISM IN ENGLAND.

I.

WHO ARE THESE PEOPLE?

IF one asks of the Unitarians of England what their history has been during the present century, it is necessary, first of all, to define who are meant by the people so described. We are concerned in the series of articles, of which this is the first, with a religious community gathered into a small group of churches, which have had a history, and which have a future before them. A list of these churches, published in the "Essex Hall Year Book," shows that in England they number 286, and that of these 156 have a history going back beyond the limits of the present century.* In fact, many of them trace back an unbroken line of congregational life to the earliest days of English Nonconformity, when they certainly were not Unitarian; and one chief lesson of their history is to bring out with great clearness the vital importance of maintaining, as they do, the principle of religious fellowship in spiritual freedom, unbound by dogmatic limitations.

Thus "Unitarian," if it is to be interpreted in a strict doctrinal sense, as denoting belief in the Uni-personality, and not the Tri-personality of God, is an awkward name under which to classify such churches, since for many of them it is historically inaccurate and misleading, and seems to run directly counter to their fundamental principle of religious fellowship. Yet common usage will have it so. During the present century the members of this community have undoubtedly, with very few exceptions, been Unitarians in their doctrinal belief, and although there are, as a matter of fact, many more (conscious or unconscious) Unitarians in other churches than in their connection, and their connection is not bound to any limitation of Unitarian doctrine, it is they who are known as the Unitarian body.

"If we would ask"—said the late Charles Beard, in the introductory article which he wrote in 1864, as editor of the Theological Review—"If we would ask, not for the name, but for the definition of the congregations known in English Christianity as Unitarian, our answer would be, that they were 'Free Churches, adopting a congregational discipline, and holding a Unitarian theology.'" And twenty-one years later, preaching at the Birmingham meeting of the National Conference, into which these churches have latterly been gathered, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong declared that the churches there represented were in their fundamental principle Free and Catholic. At the next triennial meeting of the Conference, held at Leeds in 1888, the late Dr. Martineau, in propounding his great scheme for the better organisation of those churches, suggested that in place of the laborious title of the Conference as embracing "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian and other Nonsubscribing or Kindred Congregations," the one name of English Presbyterian should be adopted; but the suggestion was not found to be practicable, and these churches, still without one generally accepted and distinctive name, are classed together as the Unitarian body.

* In Wales, Scotland, and Ireland there are also churches belonging to the same community, and with a similar, if not the same history; but in these articles, for the sake of clearness and singleness of impression, we shall speak only of England.

The time may come, when, re-born to a new fervour and clearness of purpose and spiritual insight, they will realise that they are in fact a union of Free Catholic Churches, and that they can have no other name; but that time is not yet. In dealing, therefore, with the present century we speak of Unitarianism in England, in order to show what it has meant in the history of our community, and what it is to make of our Free Churches in the future.

Different Members of the Body.

Of the churches represented in the National Conference, and enumerated in the "Essex Hall Year Book," the origin has been very various. The greater number of those 156, whose history goes back beyond the present century, had been founded either by English Presbyterians or Independents, or both together. Others were of Baptist origin, and one of the oldest, the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, went back to early Puritan days, before the Commonwealth, and had been at first connected with the Episcopal Church. In all these there had been during the eighteenth century a gradual movement of thought from the old Calvinism, by various stages, towards Unitarianism. Two only of those 156 (or rather the predecessors of the present churches) were founded distinctly as Unitarian Chapels—Essex-street Chapel, London, which has now become Essex Hall, while Essex Church is established in Kensington, and Mosley-street Chapel, Manchester, now represented by Upper Brook-street Free Church.

Of the 130 churches in the list above mentioned, founded in the present century, several in East Lancashire had their origin among Methodists, after the expulsion from that body of Joseph Cooke, of Rochdale, in 1806, and others in the North were founded by Joseph Barker, after his expulsion in 1841 from the Methodist New Connexion;* and others again were of other origin, but the greater number were the result of missionary efforts by Unitarians themselves.

Unitarian Propagandism.

At the beginning of the century the venerable Theophilus Lindsey, who on leaving the Church of England had founded Essex-street Chapel in 1774, had still seven years to live, and with him was associated in the ministry John Disney, another clergyman who had left the Church. But Joseph Priestley, having seen his house and chapel in Birmingham wrecked by the Church and Tory mob in 1791, had left this country, to end his days in Pennsylvania. He died in 1804, the year before James Martineau was born. Priestley had been minister not only at the New Meeting, Birmingham, but at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, and earlier still at Nantwich, and had been the leader of a vigorous Unitarian movement in the old Nonconformist congregations, known generally as Presbyterian, in distinction from the Independent churches, which had remained strictly orthodox. In conjunction with Lindsey and Belsham he had founded in 1791 the "Unitarian Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue by the Distribution of Books," while in 1806 was established the "Unitarian Fund," which aimed at the promotion of Unitarianism by encouraging popular preaching and the support of poor congregations. Of this new society, Robert Aspland, a Baptist convert, was the secretary, and Richard Wright the devoted missionary. Aspland, who was minister at Hackney from 1805 until his death in 1845, also founded in 1806 the Monthly Repository, and in 1815 the Christian Reformer, which in the old days were the representative Unitarian magazines. It was only in 1842 that THE INQUIRER was established as our first weekly paper.

In the early years of the century it was still illegal to profess Unitarian beliefs, and it was only in 1813 that the penal laws, long obsolete, were repealed. Then in 1819 a third society was established for the protection of the Civil Rights of Unitarians, and these three were merged in 1825 in the one British and Foreign Unitarian Association, "for the promotion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity at home and abroad, the support of its worship, the diffusion of biblical, theological and literary knowledge on topics connected with it, and the maintenance of the civil rights and interests of its professors." In the same year, at Boston, Mass., the American Unitarian Association was founded.

The vigorous Unitarian movement which produced these central societies in London was no less marked in other parts of the country, and hence various provincial societies on the same lines such as the "Society of Unitarian Christians," established in the South of England in 1801, "for promoting the genuine knowledge of the Scriptures and the practice of virtue by the distribution of books"; the "Eastern Unitarian Society," established in 1813, including among its objects "a more intimate union between the different Unitarian congregations in the district," and the encouragement of missionary efforts; and a similar society in the far north, founded in the same year, and now the "Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association for Missionary Purposes."

The Right of Liberty Established.

One result of this widespread activity was to call public attention to the growth of Unitarianism, and to bring to the point of active hostility the objection of orthodox Dissenters to the possession by Unitarians of old chapels and other trust property which they had inherited from earlier generations. It was urged that since Unitarianism had only been legalised in this country in 1813, Unitarians had no right to hold an old meeting-house, or any other trust property, which dated from a time when only Trinitarian doctrine could be legally professed. This view was successfully maintained in the Courts, in the case of the Wolverhampton Chapel, which opened in 1817, and in the case of the Hewley Trust, decided after twelve years of litigation in 1842. The Trust had been founded in 1705, by Lady Hewley of York, "for poor and godly ministers of Christ's holy gospel" ministering north of the Trent, with no further declaration of the form of doctrine to be taught. In the course of the doctrinal changes of the eighteenth century the Trust came to be held by Unitarians, and was administered by them in an impartial spirit for the benefit of Trinitarian and Unitarian ministers alike. But according to the law, as it then stood, the Unitarian trustees were displaced, and their ministers ceased to benefit from the Fund. Thus it became clear that only fresh legislation could protect the Unitarian congregations who had inherited old chapels and other property, and this was secured by the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act in 1844. The Bill was brought in by the Government of Sir Robert Peel, and received the support of Sir John Russell, leader of the Opposition, and also of Lord Brougham, Macaulay, and Gladstone, as a simple act of justice, to relieve the old congregations that had become Unitarian, from an intolerable position. The plea of the advocates of the Bill was that the English Presbyterians, who built the old chapels, had systematically refrained from limiting their trusts to particular forms of doctrine, and were on principle "non-subscribers," so that each generation was free to follow its own convictions of truth. So the change from Trinitarian to Unitarian was justified, in a continuous congregational life maintained from one generation to another in the same place of worship, and the Act of 1844 legalised such doctrinal changes, making a usage of twenty-five years sufficient protection for any form of religious teaching where the trust contained no specific doctrinal limitations. If changes of less than twenty-five years' standing should be objected to, it would seem that trouble could still be made by persons who were so minded.

The Principle of Church Fellowship.

The agitation which culminated in the passing of the Dissenters' Chapel Act of 1844, if it did not establish an ideal condition of the law, brought out in a striking manner the lessons of history for the Non-subscribing Churches. The Unitarian members of those churches, in entering on this controversy, found that it was necessary to prove themselves in their church-life something more than Unitarians. As worshippers in the old free chapels they claimed, and rightly claimed, to be members of the body known generally as English Presbyterian, of which the distinctive mark was not a particular form of doctrine, but the principle of undogmatic religious fellowship. Robert Aspland, who was the first secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was also very active in directing the defence of the old position, and he and others saw clearly that the doctrinal Association could not rightly represent the undogmatic churches; Aspland, therefore (as he wrote to his son early in 1843), got the committee of his Association to originate a new "English Presbyterian Union" in order to concentrate the forces of the old congregations for defence, and their victory was happily secured.

In later years, this distinction was largely lost sight of. The zeal for Unitarian teaching, which about the middle of the century produced several very active missionary societies in different parts of the country, for the purpose of spreading the knowledge of Unitarian Christianity, sustaining churches and planting new ones, pointed naturally to the drawing together of the whole body of churches, old and new, with their manifold origins, simply as Unitarian churches, of which the central organising society was the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. But this was to take up a position in direct contradiction to that which prevailed at the time of the Dissenters' Chapel Act, and there were always those in the churches, both ministers and laymen, who held to the earlier position, insisting on the continuity of religious life and the need of maintaining an open fellowship. Of these upholders of the ideal of a Free Church, the greatest was James Martineau, and by his side John Hamilton Thom. Many others, not less eager champions of the truth of Unitarian Christianity, yet held with them that the churches, as worshipping societies unpledged to any form of doctrine, based not on a creed but on the strength of an unbroken spiritual life, ought not to bear a dogmatic name; and, further, that a body of Free Churches ought not to have as their central representative society an Association pledged to the maintenance of a particular form of doctrine. The issue was forcibly stated by Dr. Martineau in two letters on "The Unitarian Position" and "Church-Life or Sect-Life?" (1859), which will be found in the second volume of his collected Essays. In the same volume is also the later essay (1869) on "New Affinities of Faith: a Plea for Free Christian Union."

But before the formation of the short-lived Free Christian Union, the controversy had issued in a practical settlement so far as the Unitarian Association was concerned. At the annual meeting in 1866 a motion by the Rev. Samuel Bache to add to Rule I. a fuller definition of the Unitarian doctrine to which the Association is pledged, was met by carrying the previous question, and at the following annual meeting, after a large special committee representing both sides in the controversy had reported, the Association ceased to be directly representative of Churches, and became simply a society of individual subscribers. At the same time during the secretaryship of the late Robert Spears, who was followed by the late Henry Ierson, and Mr. Bowie, the present secretary, the Association entered on a period of increased activity in the work, not only of the spread of Unitarian literature, but of the support of churches and other missionary activities both at home and abroad.

The National Conference.

Meanwhile, the establishment in 1882 of the National Conference (with the comprehensive title above quoted) and the better organisation of local associations of churches, which now cover the whole country, have strengthened the conception of unity and mutual dependence among our Free Churches. In 1897 the Committee of the National Conference was entrusted with further powers, that it may continuously represent the congregations and Associations which form the Conference, and be prepared, whenever the need arises, to act in their interest. Thus, while the central Unitarian Association continues to render its most efficient services to the Free Churches, to which its members for the most part belong, the way seems to open for a more effective organisation of those churches themselves, which shall give complete expression to their ideal of open fellowship and unity of spiritual life.

Outward Fortunes and Inward Life.

To the outward history of these Free Churches imperfectly indicated in these brief notes, we must add in subsequent articles some account of the course of religious thought and life during the century, in which a progressive Unitarianism has often done effective pioneer work for the rest of Christendom; while, at the same time, it must be shown what is the special religious service to which these churches are now called.

LITURGICAL SERVICES.

SIR,—I have read with much interest an article in the last number of THE INQUIRER on "Liturgical Services," in which the attention of your readers is drawn to the new work, by Mr. W. Copeland Bowie, entitled "Seven Services for Public Worship." Might I be permitted to say in your columns what, no doubt, many have already thought—namely, how much we are all indebted to Mr. Copeland Bowie for his most excellent book. Of all the liturgical books with which I am acquainted, his seems to me to be, on the whole, the most practical and useful; it happily combines traditional religious thoughts of widest range with a devotional spirit, full of freshness and simple beauty. His book supplies a real want, and its general adoption would, I think, largely tend to increase the dignity and reverence in worship among our Free Churches.

At present, in too many places, a few prayers, very beautiful prayers sometimes, are said or read by the minister, but there is no genuine congregational worship, because there is no regular opportunity for the congregation to join audibly in the most solemn part of the service, apart from some hymns or Psalms which are themselves, I fear, too often left to the trained musical powers of a choir.

In these days there is a growing feeling in many quarters, that the indirect sermon call the "long Prayer" has too long usurped the place of united congregational worship, and that it is no proper expression of what Common Prayer should be. Mr. Copeland Bowie's new liturgical work seems, to me, the most valuable response to that feeling.

CROYDON FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

SERVICES, commemorating the founding of the Free Christian Church, Croydon, were conducted by the minister on Sunday, Dec. 9. On the previous evening, by invitation of about twenty ladies, the old church, now used as a hall for social meetings, was thronged by a thoroughly united and happy company of friends. In the course of the evening the Chairman of the Church Committee, Mr. T. Mathews, read a brief narrative of the first beginnings of the church. This included a remarkably interesting letter from Dr. Martineau, concerning the name of the church, which indicates the ground of his objection to the word "Unitarian" as applied to a church, his feeling out after a wider fellowship and testimony, and his reasons for halting at the Christian name. It appears that Dr. Martineau was especially interested in the founding of this church and in some of its founders. The following passage from Mr. Mathews' paper, including the letter referred to, deserves careful attention:—

"The fourth meeting was held on June 27, 1870, at Mr. F. Walters' house, 7, The Waldrons. Mr. Walters read a letter from Mr. Malleson regretting his inability to be present, and enclosing a letter from the Rev. James (afterwards Dr.) Martineau.

This letter had great influence in determining the name ultimately adopted. It is as follows:—

10, Gordon-street, London, W.C.,
25 June, 1870.

My Dear Mr. Malleson,—I am glad to hear of a movement towards the establishment of a new congregation in Croydon.

The two points about which I should feel anxious are:—1st. That the constitution defined in the Trust Deed, should be Theologically open, the object being stated in very general terms, such as "For the Worship of Almighty God and building up of a righteous life."

2nd. That in conformity with this open principle, the name should be doctrinally neutral, and should, therefore, not include the word "Unitarian."

As the function of a name is to mark a distinction, and as all other Churches from which you have to indicate distinction are based on doctrinal specialities, there is an immense temptation to fall in with this mode of classification, and name your present dogmatic characteristic. But to do so is to adopt the worst vice of the ecclesiastical systems around, and to paralise your theological protest in the very act of making it. The name should mark, in my opinion, not the particular doctrine you adopt, but the different attitude you take from that assumed by others towards doctrinal theology as a whole in its relation to the religious life. For myself I am by no means satisfied with the title "Free Christian," but at present I know of no better, though I have sometimes inclined rather to the name "Free Protestant." The word "Free" expresses simply enough the fact of an open doctrinal constitution, and is therefore not chargeable (like the word "Liberal") with any boastfulness or claim of merit. The word "Christian" is objected to, I am aware, by some excellent men as if it implied a creed. To surrender it to any such meaning appears to me an unworthy betrayal into the hands of ecclesiastical corruption of the grandest of Providential agencies.

For my part I value Christianity for the Theistic Religion it has given me, and which others may, perhaps, get elsewhere; but only by the word Christian can I indicate my historical obligation and the characteristic type of the Theism which represents for me the relation between God and man. It seems to me important to claim the word in this simple sense as an index to one's spiritual genealogy.

If the "Free Christian Union" should continue to exist, a congregation would gain additional security for these principles by joining it; but, discouraged by the indifference of its apparent friends and the hopeless lapse of the old Catholic-minded Nonconformity into a miserable "Unitarian" denomination, I am about to propose at the annual meeting in the University Hall to-day the dissolution of the Union in the course of a few months.—Ever faithfully yours, JAMES MARTINEAU.

To W. Malleson, Esq.

Dr. Martineau was thanked (through Mr. Malleson) for this letter, and was, at the same time, asked his advice as to a first minister. This resulted in the recommendation by him, to use his own words, of "a gentleman, a Superior of a Dominican order, who found his religious opinions approaching those of Theodore Parker, and who, he thought, would be disposed to undertake the duties of minister to a 'Free Christian Church' if he could rely upon a cordial reception."

This he certainly did receive, and I well remember hearing him say that he never dreamed while in the Roman Catholic communion that outside of it such deep religious fellowship existed or could exist."

The reading of Mr. Mathews' valuable paper was followed by speeches from Mr. J. Williams, Mr. C. Gane, and the minister, Mr. J. Page Hopps, who proposed a vote of thanks to their hostesses. This was, of course, carried with acclamation. The minister, in the course of his remarks, said that while he entirely agreed with the historical value and propriety of the designation "Christian," he always felt drawn to the wider fellowship of humanity, and this longing had found expression in "Our Father's Church," which had, at all events, shown how possible it was to establish and practically carry on a spiritual church, or community of kindred spirits, on the broadest human basis.

On the following day large and animated congregations assembled in the beautiful church, especially in the evening, when the minister spoke of keeping watch with Christ in our modern Gethsemane, and in being true to his Ideal as to the coming of the Heavenly Kingdom upon earth.

THE one divine work—the one ordered sacrifice—is to do justice; and it is the last we are ever inclined to do. Anything rather than that! As much charity as you choose, but no justice. "Nay," you will say, "charity is greater than justice." Yes, it is greater; it is the summit of justice—it is the temple of which justice is the foundation. But you can't have the top without the bottom; you cannot build upon charity. You must build upon justice, for this main reason, that you have not, at first, charity to build with. It is the last reward of good work. Do justice to your brother (you can do that whether you love him or not), and you will come to love him. But do injustice to him, because you don't love him, and you will come to hate him.—John Ruskin.

MONEE'S WEDDING.

BY THE LATE MRS. F. TEASDALE REED.

MONEE lived in S——, a town in Bengal far enough from the delta of the Ganges to be prettily situated in an undulating country, and within sight of hills, not very high, but beautifully blue throughout the rainy season.

Her parents belonged to a Christian community, the fruits of the patient toil, for many years, of Baptist missionaries. The immortal Dr. Carey had been there sometimes, and others had wrought, in not only his spirit, but better still, in the spirit of his Master. One dear old man had there for nearly sixty years lived a most exemplary, saintly life, which had powerfully influenced his flock. And thus it came to pass that Monee had been trained in rules of life differing from those of Mussulmans and Hindoos around her. She was the eldest of a large family, and was well acquainted with housewifely duties, so that she might have passed an examination with credit, and gained the degree of F.F.W. But though quite fit for a wife, she had neither beauty nor portion—and in India as elsewhere a dowerless wife is generally unsought. Poor Monee! it was a sore trouble to her and to her parents—for was she not fourteen years of age, and tall, and unmarried! Non-Christian acquaintances and neighbours sneered. Their daughters were married any time between babyhood and six years old; it was a scandal to have so big a girl at home. Monee scarcely ventured out-of-doors more than to go to the chapel for fear of jeers and reproaches. Many were the efforts made to find her a spouse; Christian villages far and near were tried in vain.

At last came the joyful news that a suitable parti had been induced to come forward. The earliest possible date was fixed that the prize might not be lost; and in the home, from early morning till late at night, all hands were hard at work. There must be two or three days' feasting for forty or fifty guests, and, as all were rice-eaters, scores of pounds of rice had to be husked, and the treadle kept going for hours. Turmeric and curry stuffs were pounded, and sweetmeats prepared. Arrangements were made for the supply of gallons of milk and of mustard oil. A large fat goat was bought and killed; two or three fish, each nearly a yard long, were caught, and prepared for curries. Everyone put a shoulder to the wheel, and things went merrily. The bride's dress gave little anxiety, for her uncle had given her a six-yard length of handsome plum-coloured silk, with red and yellow flowers, and a deep rich border, and this was all she needed, except a thin vest and white stockings and patent leather shoes.

The day which was to be eventful in more than one respect dawned bright and sunny. The wedding was to take place in the afternoon. All the morning, cooks were busy working might and main, and things were well forward when the time was up. At the appointed hour the bride attired, waited the summons to proceed to the chapel. But the hour came and went, followed by another, and another, and the bridegroom came not. Poor Monee! was the cup to be snatched from her very fingers? Her uncle was furious: "No wedding!" "It shall not be." "Is all that food to be wasted?" So saying, he rushed away, hired a conveyance, and dashed off to the nearest railway station ten miles away, and took the next train, leaving the wedding party to their own devices.

Next day he returned with a younger companion. After a short interval, all assembled in the chapel, and Monee was married. What did it matter that she had never seen, or heard the name of, her bridegroom? No Bengalee wife may utter the name of her lord and master. Poor patient Monee. After all, her servitude proved no harder than the average.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. B. Kirkman Gray will be glad to receive parcels of clothing, toys, &c., and appeals for donations both for relief and for Christmas entertainments. More is being spent this year on classes, and £5 is still needed to complete the payment for the billiard-table procured for the Men's Club. Parcels should be addressed to Mr. Gray, at the People's Hall, Bell-street, Edgware-road, N.W.; donations may be sent to the Rev. B. K. Gray, 25, Carlton-mansions, Portsdown-road, W.

Accrington.—A Sale of Work was held on Thursday and Saturday, Dec. 6 and 8, for the purpose of raising funds for the redemption of the ground rent upon the land on which the Unitarian Chapel and School stand. As a result of a similar effort in 1899, some £105 was raised, but in order to complete the fund it was desired to bring this up to £200. The sale was opened on Thursday by the Mayor of Bury, Mr. Thomas Holt, with a genial and kindly speech, Mr. George Elce, of Altham, in the chair. Mr. Holt called to mind the fact that he had visited the Accrington Unitarians nearly forty years before, when he came over with the late Rev. John Wright, who was preaching the "Sermons." On Saturday the sale was opened by Mr. George Webster, J.P., of Wakefield, the Rev. W. H. Burgess in the chair. After hymn and prayer, the chairman introduced Mr. Webster as one who had done good service for the Unitarian church in Yorkshire, and as one whom they were specially glad to welcome, seeing that his son, Mr. Alfred Webster, had rendered the Accrington congregation such good service as treasurer, and also as superintendent in the Sunday-school. Mr. Webster opened the sale with a thoughtful and helpful address, indicating the need for supporting the church and the church life, since through them the family and the community were alike served. The proceeds of the sale (together with a few subscriptions, including a donation of £5 from Mr. Holt) amounted to £80. This gives a total of £185 available for the purchase of the ground-rent. It is the minister's earnest hope that the £15 needed to complete the fund may be gathered in before the end of the year.

Astley.—On Saturday, Dec. 1, a Sale of Work for the purpose of creating an Independence Fund and for other congregational purposes was opened in the Unitarian School, by Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., of Tyldesley, who was introduced by the Rev. P. Holt, the minister. The result of the sale, with donations, was £73.

Bootle.—A small Sale of Work in connection with the Ladies' Work Society of the Free Church, was opened on Thursday afternoon, the 6th inst., and realised about £28.

Brighton.—The annual Sale of Work was held in the lecture hall of the Free Christian Church on Wednesday, Dec. 5, and was provided with a great variety of attractions, so that an enjoyable social evening was spent, and the sum of about £40 was raised.

Dunmurry, co. Antrim.—The numerous friends of the late Mr. Henry J. M'Cance, D.L., will be glad to know that the memorial sermon preached by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, on his death, has now (by request) been printed. Mr. Kelly has prefaced the discourse by a striking portrait, together with facsimile of the autograph, and a short biography of the deceased. The Ulster Unitarian Christian Association are acting as publishers, and copies can be obtained from their agent at the Depository 35 Rosemary-street, Belfast.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The third meeting of the present session was held on Saturday evening last, in the schoolroom of the Stratford Church, West Ham-lane. Upwards of thirty were present. Mr Thomas Elliot, of Highgate, read a helpful paper on "The Teacher's Chief Power," dwelling on the power of personal influence as of the greatest importance. After the reading of the paper, Messrs. Waddington, Noel, Thompson, Robins, and the Chairman, Mr. Lucking Tavener, made a few comments, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Elliot. Refreshments and music were, as usual, provided. The next meeting will be held at Walthamstow on Jan. 12 next, when Mr. Frank Talbot will give a paper on "The Higher Criticism of the Bible and its Possibilities in Sunday-school Teaching."

Edinburgh: St. Mark's Chapel.—On Saturday, Dec. 8, a bazaar, "in aid of special congregational purposes," was held in the Oddfellows' Hall. The Rev. R. B. Drummond, who presided, said that if church bazaars were ever justifiable, he thought this might be claimed for the present effort, inasmuch as its object was not to clear off a debt rashly or unadvisedly incurred, but to meet necessary and unavoidable expenses. They were greatly indebted both to those who had worked so heartily in the cause, and to the many kind friends who had sent contributions, including many who were not of their own church. Mr. J. F. McLennan, advocate, in the course of a humorous speech, expressed the pleasure he had in being present, remarking that although sectarianism seemed to be still active in some parts of the country, in the metropolis it was very much a thing of the past. He then declared the bazaar open. The proceeds of the sale (with several contributions in money) amounted to over £200.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—On Monday, Dec. 3, a social meeting to welcome the Rev. James Forrest, M.A., to the ministry of St. Vincent-street Church, was held in the Masonic Hall, West Regent-street. There was a large and enthusiastic attendance of members and friends of the congregation. Mr. James Clerk presided, and among those present were the Revs. Frank Walters, A. E. Parry (Kirkcaldy), Alex. Webster (Aberdeen), E. T. Russell (Glasgow), and R. J. Kyd (parish minister of Stevenston); Messrs. Collins, Hamilton, Noble, Graham, and others. Mr. Collins, the secretary, intimated apologies from the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, R. B. Drummond, B.A. (Edinburgh), H. W. Williamson (Dundee), Dr. John Hunter (Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow), and David Macrae. Mr. Macrae, writing from the Continent, congratulated the congregation on securing Mr. Forrest as their minister. Mr. Forrest, he said, was a man of great ability, courage, and energy, and he would prove an accession, not only to the St. Vincent-street Church, but to the moral and intellectual forces of Glasgow. The chairman said it was his pleasant duty to offer Mr. Forrest a very hearty and warm welcome to St. Vincent-street. He felt that they had been extremely fortunate in securing as preacher and teacher a man with such a strength of character and individuality as Mr. Forrest's whole life showed him to possess. He would be to them a guide, philosopher, and friend, one who would teach them only what he honestly believed, and one whose life would not give the lie to his teaching. Mr. Forrest was a Scotsman born and bred, so that it might be said, with all deference to their English brethren, that, as he had less to unlearn, and as he knew their national ways and weaknesses, the chances of his success among them were all the greater. Mr. Graham and others added cordial words of welcome, and the Rev. F. Walters gave an earnest, powerful, and encouraging address on the duties and privileges of minister and people. Mrs. Ballantyne, on behalf of the ladies of the congregation, then presented Mr. Forrest with a pulpit gown and cassock. Mr. Forrest, having donned the gown amid enthusiastic and prolonged cheering, said it was impossible to find words to express the feelings stirred by all the kind things they had said of him and to him. He thankfully rejoiced in the prospect of the ministry of St. Vincent-street Church. It afforded him a field of labour that was after his own heart. In a city like Glasgow their church ought to be a centre of religious and educational enlightenment and progress. It had always been so, and he trusted it would continue to be so in even larger measure. There was all round them a tendency to step out of the old ruts of theological belief, and they should have a share in giving an impetus to that forward movement. He hoped he would do something to effect this, and trusted also to take his part in all philanthropic and other good work in their great city. He asked their earnest and united help in all his endeavours. An interesting musical programme, arranged by Mr. E. C. Pryor, the organist of the church, formed a pleasing part of the proceedings.

Halstead (Essex).—It is very gratifying to find that the revival of the congregation in this town is still going on. Greater interest is being manifested, and the number present at each meeting is steadily increasing. On Sunday last, when the service was conducted by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., about eighty adults were present, which is more than double the average attendance a year ago. The improved condition of this congregation has lately been the subject of favourable editorial comment in the local Press.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Thursday, Dec. 6, in the Hope-street Church Hall (the President, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, in the chair), when a paper by the Rev. Dr. Klein on "The Study of the Bible and How to Teach It" was read by Mrs. Klein, as her husband was suffering from a severe cold. The paper was divided into two parts: I. Why Study the Bible? II. How to teach it. A discussion followed, and, in reply, Dr. Klein showed that there was not such a lack of literature illustrating the Bible, as was imagined, and named a number of good books obtainable. He also spoke very strongly in favour of Bible teaching. The Chairman proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Klein for his interesting and helpful paper, and announced that early in the new year Professor Carpenter was coming to Liverpool to give a course of six lectures on "The Bible," and he hoped the teachers in all our schools would endeavour to attend. There were about sixty teachers and friends from the different schools present.

London: Brixton.—A supplementary Sale, in aid of the London Unitarian Bazaar Fund, was held at Effra-road on Wednesday, 5th inst. Mrs. Blake Odgers opened the proceedings with an appropriate speech, and then presented to Miss Martineau, the hon. secretary of the Brixton Committee for the Bazaar, a testimonial (consisting of a revolving bookcase and books) on behalf of the Effra-road congregation, as a mark of their appreciation of her unwearying efforts in aid of the Bazaar Fund. Although the weather, on the evening of the sale, was very inclement, the amount realised was £72 16s.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—Since the impressive communion service conducted in the Unitarian Free Church by the Rev. W. Reynolds, the minister, on Nov. 4, a series of helpful meetings have been held. On Wednesday, Nov. 7, the Rev. Charles Hargrove preached an inspiring sermon to a good congregation. On the following Sunday anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. B. C. Constable, and a P. S. A. meeting was addressed by the Rev. W. C. Bowie. On Nov. 18 the Rev. J. P. Hopps preached and addressed the P. S. A. meeting, the church being filled; and on Nov. 25 the preacher was the Rev. W. Binns. On Nov. 6, 7, and 8 a very successful Sale of Work was held, towards raising the £225 needed to clear the church of debt. Much enthusiasm has been kindled by these meetings, and the congregation tender their best thanks to the friends who have helped their efforts.

Manchester: Moss-side. — On Wednesday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. John Harwood (of Pendleton) gave a most interesting and instructive lecture and recital, entitled "How I became a Public Reciter; the Art of Public Recitation; Its Humours and Difficulties." The lecture is taken entirely from Mr. Harwood's own experiences, and is brimming over with wit and humour, and full of excellent advice to would-be entertainers, public speakers, &c. The lecture was illustrated by typical recitations, and was heartily appreciated by the large audience assembled.

Pontypridd: Presentation to Dr. Griffiths.—On Thursday week, after the annual tea-meeting in connection with the Unitarian Church, the congregation presented Dr. and Mrs. Griffiths with a gold watch and a silver cake-basket respectively. The meeting was presided over by Mr. L. N. Williams, of Aberdare, President of the South Wales Unitarian Association, who, in the course of his address, spoke of the harmony that had always existed between minister and congregation, and hoped the latter would not lose heart nor abate in its efforts to propagate what appeared to them to be the religion of Jesus. The Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, spoke of the high regard he had for Dr. Griffiths's earnestness and sincerity, and felt that the Unitarians of South Wales would suffer a great loss by his removal from Pontypridd. Mr. John Lewis, treasurer of the church, said that the members of the congregation regarded it as a privilege that they had been permitted to retain the services of Dr. Griffiths for so long, and that the presents then before them were tokens of their sincere regard and deep respect for both Dr. and Mrs. Griffiths. Dr. Griffiths, in returning thanks, said that no period of his life had been more pleasant than the eight years he had spent at Pontypridd. He advised the members to continue faithful to the movement as members of a community, free not only from State-control, but also from time-honoured articles of belief, free to follow the spirit of truth and goodness whithersoever it might lead. The presentations were made by Mrs. John Lewis and Mr. Rees Howells.

Poole.—On Wednesday, Dec. 5, a Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom, opened by the Mayoress, Mrs. Curtis. Although the weather was very bad, the result of the sale was fairly satisfactory, and reflects great credit on the Ladies' Sewing Circle, who made all the arrangements.

Preston.—On Friday, Nov. 30, the Rev. Thomas Robinson, of Hale, paid a visit to Percy-street Chapel, and gave a most enjoyable and instructive talk on "Ants and their Ways." It was chatty and "jokey," and held the interest of everyone throughout. Mr. Robinson's method is a little novel, and was much appreciated. His "talk" is illustrated and supplemented, as he goes on, by means of drawings in coloured chalk, rapidly sketched on a large blackboard, illuminated by lantern-light. The ant is analysed, pulled to pieces, and put together again in a manner that is at once harmless and highly entertaining. There was a good attendance at the lecture, and a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Robinson was passed at the close.

Southend.—On Thursday evening, Dec. 16, a social meeting was held in the church to welcome Mr. Dear, who had recently accepted the oversight of the congregation. Although the weather was very wet, about sixty friends assembled to express, by their presence, their pleasure at the settlement of Mr. Dear among them. Already the attendance at the service on Sunday had improved, a Sunday-school had been established, and the outlook was very encouraging. The Provincial Assembly was represented by its President, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., and the Rev. L. E. M. Edwards, who has had charge of the congregation since the death of the Rev. R. Spears. Mr. Harry, of Chelmsford, and Messrs. Crane and Sloman, members of the church, also took part in the proceedings. Musical selections, instrumental and vocal, and recitations were given by local friends during the evening.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Christmas number of THE INQUIRER is being sent out more widely than usual, and next week's issue will be distributed in the same way. Will all friends, near and distant, accept through these words, the Editor's good wishes at this season, and grateful thanks for abundant help and sympathy in what is by no means an easy task? A supplement will be found enclosed, with a statement as to the prospect for the New Year (and the New Century), and we will only repeat here the request of its last sentence.

FOR some years several friends have generously paid for copies of THE INQUIRER, to be sent to Free Libraries in different parts of the country. During the present year about forty copies were sent out, but the cost was not quite met by the donations of friends. In the coming year we shall be grateful for the means of even wider usefulness in this direction.

THE subject of the "Boys Own Brigade" has recently been very fully dealt with in these columns by three warm supporters of such work. As to the object aimed at by the officers of the brigade there can be no difference of opinion among us, but some of our friends hold very strongly that all the good of healthy discipline and esprit de corps may be secured in a "Life Saving Brigade," entirely apart from any military associations. The subject ought to be fully discussed, and after Christmas our columns will be open for that purpose. In our New Year's number, or the following week, we shall publish a letter from Miss Florence Hill, and we would invite special attention to the subject on the part of those who are practically engaged in work among the boys.

THE report of the final meeting of the Council of the London Unitarian Bazaar, which will be found in another column, shows more than one very gratifying result. That a total of £13,916 18s. 11d. should have been gained, with expenses of only £572 4s. 11d., so that there is a net result of £13,344 14s., compares very favourably with the usual experience of a great bazaar, and this result was largely due to the great organising ability and unfailing tact and assiduity of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the organising secretary of the bazaar. It is also matter for congratulation that an effort which aimed at £12,000 produced over £13,000. But can it rest there? The London Permanent Chapel Building Fund stands now at £9,000. Is not this a direct challenge to some loyal and generous friend or friends of the cause to make it at once £10,000?

WE are sorry to hear from the Rev. James Hocart, of Brussels, that the legal difficulties which have so long hampered his congregation remain exactly as they were a year ago, great pressure of other business in the courts having prevented the hearing of their claim against the municipality for the indemnity of house-rent legally due to them as a state-recognised church. Thus the congregation are faced by a deficiency of £40 in the account of the year's expenses, in addition to the old debt of £68, met at present by a reduction in the minister's salary, which it is hoped will be recovered on the successful termination of the present litigation. Mr. Hocart asks whether, in addition to the two or three generous supporters who do not wait for such an appeal, a few of those English friends, who have often expressed their sympathy with the work at Brussels, will not help by their donations to cover the deficiency of £40 before the close of the year? The number of Mr. Hocart's house has been changed, and his address now is 55, rue St. Bernard, Brussels.

THE final meeting of the trustees and members of the Liverpool Unitarian Institute was held, on Monday week, at the Hope-street Church Hall. The Committee say, in the Eleventh Annual Report, that they feel satisfied that the Unitarian Institute has been an important feature in the history of the local churches, and has materially helped their work and development. We think this statement errs, if at all, on the side of modesty. The Institute at Sandon-terrace will be missed. Some common meeting place, perhaps still more centrally situated, would be a great boom to our Liverpool churches and to visitors from other towns. Liverpool still lacks its Essex or Memorial Hall. It also looks for a cathedral! Which will it obtain first?

THE December number of Present Day Papers completes the third volume, and we are glad to find that the publication of this interesting "Monthly Review for the discussion of Modern Thought and its application to Christian faith and practice" is to be continued. An advertisement giving further particulars will be found in another column. In a note in the December number the Editor says :—

> While regarding life from the broadest Quaker standpoint, we seek a wider constituency than that which the actual membership of our Society can afford. There are Friends in all churches; there are Friends outside the limits of organised Christianity. For them and to them we desire to speak no less than to those in outward association with us. These are changeful and critical times, and they who would win the meaning hidden behind the sinister aspect of modern life must find their moral stimulus in association with kindred spirits. The common ground for such a fellowship must be sought in a re-statement—it may be a new statement—of spiritual religion and of its practical working in society. Towards this we address ourselves, conscious of much weakness, but also conscious of the need and of the call.

Among the contributors to the third volume have been Miss F. E. Cooke, and the Rev. Henry Rawlings, Prof. A. S. Peake, and Mr. G. Buchanan Gray, of Mansfield College, as well as a number of prominent members of the Society of Friends. Each monthly number does not contain a large amount of matter, but the papers have been and promise to be very interesting and helpful, and they are published in an attractive form. This magazine, edited by J. Wilhelm Rowntree, and The British Friend, edited by William Edward Turner, of Colwyn Bay, N. Wales (also 6d. monthly, and to be had from the editor, or from Headley Bros.), we warmly commend to those of our readers who are attracted by the thoughtful and earnest writings of broad-minded Friends.

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR reached Calcutta on Thursday, Nov. 22, after an absence of eight months on a visit to this country and America. At Bombay and Bankipur, where he stayed for a day or two on the way, he received a warm welcome from his co-religionists; at Bankipur especially, where a festival had been prepared in his honour, he was garlanded, and poems of welcome in English and Bengalee were recited. In a few words of greeting to his friends, published in The Interpreter and the New Dispensation, Mr. Mozoomdar says :—

May the sympathies and encouragements given by other nations cheer and strengthen the hearts of my fellow-believers in India, and may the career of the Brahmo Somaj now and in future be the career of truth, brotherhood, righteousness and peace.

To that prayer we in this country must say with all our hearts, Amen.

MR. HEM CHANDRA SARKAR, who received a very cordial welcome in Calcutta on his return, after two years of study at Manchester College, Oxford, has at once found abundant scope for all his energies in literary and religious work. We are glad to see from an announcement in the Indian Messenger, which now has the benefit of his co-operation, that it is proposed to resume the publication of the "Brahmo Year-Book," as a complete handbook of the Theistic movement in India, and that Mr. Sarkar will act as editor.

The Church of England Pulpit and Ecclesiastical Review, which is now the official organ of the "Churchman's Union," devoted a leading article on Dec. 8, to the last of Mr. Carpenter's recent lectures at Essex Hall, on "The Bible and the Church." Following the lines of our notes of that lecture, published at the time, the article concluded :—"We would there were a wider inclination to face these questions among Church people to-day."

A BEAUTIFUL stained-glass window by Mr. Alfred East, the well-known artist, has recently been placed in the New College Congregational Church, Upper Avenue-road, London, and is quite a new departure in the modern development of this art. The subject is derived from pure landscape, and represents in a very effective way and in beautiful colouring, trees, flowers, distant mountains, and running waters. The Studio says that the artist "has shown unmistakably that a landscape window may not only be an object of transcendent beauty, but also that it can express a religious sentiment as well as, nay, even better than the groups of blue and red-coated saints so ineffectually and inartistically crowded together in the ordinary 'trade' window."

THE SETH IBBETSON FUND.—The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, 43, Blenheim-road, Bradford, desires to acknowledge, with sincere thanks, the following contributions to the above Fund :—Miss B., £10 (£2 yearly for five years) ; A. F. J., £1 ; Misses Lambert, £1 ; Mrs. Greenhow, £2 2s. ; Mrs. Arnold Lupton, £2 2s. ; Lady Durning-Lawrence, £5 ; Mrs. Russell Martineau, £3 and also a donation of £1 as a special Christmas gift. Mr. Ceredig Jones is glad to be able to announce that in response to his appeal a sufficient amount has been received or promised to enable him to make the afflicted family a weekly allowance of 11s. instead of 10s. for the next five years.

A MAN is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best ; but what he has said or done otherwise, shall give him no peace.—Emerson.

IPSWICH BICENTENARY.

The Bicentenary of St. Nicholas Old Meeting, now known as the Unitarian Chapel, Friars-street, was celebrated on Sunday and Monday last, the chapel being then re-opened after extensive repairs and renovation.

An interesting account of the old chapel, by Mr. Frank Woolnough, which appeared in the East Anglian Daily Times of Dec. 8, was reprinted in the pamphlet which contained the order of the re-opening services and pictures of the exterior of the chapel and its pulpit. The first minister of the congregation was Owen Stockton, who was ejected from Colchester, was registered as a "Presbyterian and Independent teacher," and died in 1680. He was succeeded by John Fairfax, also an ejected minister, who died in 1700, soon after he began to preach in the new chapel, which now celebrates its bicentenary. The trust of the chapel is "for the worship of Almighty God, and for the people of the Presbyterian Congregation or persuasion." Including Fairfax, there have been twenty-six ministers at the Old Meeting in the two centuries, the last having been the Rev. W. Jellie, now at Auckland, New Zealand, who is to be succeeded in the New Year by the Rev. E. Lucking Tavener.

The opening services on Sunday were conducted by the Rev. W. Lloyd, of New York, who is spending the winter at Oxford. There were large congregations, the chapel being crowded in the evening by townspeople. Mr. Lloyd's earnest discourses produced a deep impression, and the devotional and musical parts of the service were most helpful and inspiring.

MONDAY'S CELEBRATIONS.

The celebrations on Monday began with a luncheon in the schoolroom, over which Mr. G. J. NOTCUTT, presided.

At five o'clock there was a public tea, followed by a recital on the new organ by Miss A. L. Poole.

At the evening meeting the chair was taken by Sir E. DURNING LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P., who was supported by a number of prominent Unitarians of Ipswich and East Anglia generally.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said Unitarians had a grand foundation to stand upon, inasmuch as their religion was based upon the exercise of conscientious opinions. They were not founded upon some petty division or quarrel ; the Unitarian Church was established because some of the most earnest minds in the Church of England were obliged to go forth in order that they might worship according to their consciences. In regard to the progress of the dying century, the Leader of the House had made a statement, with which he fully agreed, to the effect that the last 100 years had added to the knowledge of man more than the previous 5,000 years had been able to do. He (the speaker) believed that in the next 100 years progress would be manifold as compared with the present time, and he wanted the Ipswich Unitarian Chapel to share in that progress. He trusted this renovated chapel would be a true religious home. Unitarianism was essentially an honest religion ; their creed had once been described as "one God, no devil, and 20s. in the £." In conclusion, he urged them to make Unitarianism a religion to be respected, and in every possible method extend its sphere of influence.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said they entered upon the new century face to face with ethical and religious problems which their forefathers were not called upon to solve. He could see that religious conception would undergo very deep and far-reaching changes. There had been a revival of what was called Ritualism in the Church of England ; but he anticipated an awakening of the mind and conscience of England, which would rise in revolt against the hollowness and indifference which so largely characterised the religious thought and life of our time, and which would not be permanently satisfied with ceremonial observances which had no proper basis of truth upon which to rest. For this reason he conceived that Unitarians had a very important mission to fulfil. He did not, of course, suppose that their way of looking at religion would satisfy every one, but he thought Unitarians had a message that would help the seekers of truth and sincerity in religion. He urged Unitarians to follow the example of the early founders of the Ipswich Chapel, who were courageously sincere in their thought, and wisely beneficent in their conduct.

The Rev. W. LLOYD (New York) said he knew of no Church which brought to the twentieth century a religious message so concise and comprehensive as that brought by Unitarianism, which was broad and generous in its influence.

The Rev. R. H. FULLER, M.A. (Braintree), said Unitarians had in all ages been in the van of religious progress, and he hoped they would continue to retain their character for pluck, sincerity, and uprightness.

Addresses on various phases of Unitarianism were also delivered by the Rev. A. Hall, M.A. (Norwich), the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A. (Yarmouth), Lieutenant C. F. Dear, R.A.M.S. (Colchester), the Rev. E. Lucking Tavener (minister-elect of the chapel), and Mr. A. M. Stevens (Norwich), the speeches being interspersed with anthems.

The proceedings were brought to a conclusion with the Doxology.

A collection was made during the evening on behalf of the restoration fund.

HORA CHRISTI.

SWEET is the time for joyous folk
Of gifts and minstrelsy ;
Yet I, O lowly-hearted One,
Crave but Thy company.
On lonesome road, beset with dread,
My questing lies afar.
I have no light, save in the East
The gleaming of Thy star.

THE NEW "HELPER" VOLUME.

SIR,—In your appreciative notice of this year's volume of The Helper, you kindly refer to the illustrations. May I beg space to acknowledge through you the invaluable services rendered in this connection by the Rev. Thomas Robinson, of Hale ? The original photographs and drawings were almost all supplied by him, and to his suggestions the artistic value of the volume is chiefly due.

A CENTURY OF UNITARIANISM IN ENGLAND.

II.

THE PROGRESS OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

A GLANCE at the changes which have taken place in religious thought during the present century is enough to prove the vital importance of that spiritual freedom and openness for the in-coming of new truth, to which we referred last week as one of the chief lessons of the history of our churches. Amid many anomalies in the religious life of this country, it would be difficult to find a more pitiable spectacle than that of a congregation bound by its trust to maintain "the Unitarianism of Priestley and Belsham." The only true security for a worshipping society is to be pledged not to any particular doctrine, but simply to God and His truth, as in each generation He may reveal it to reverence and humble trust by the inward witness of His Spirit.

The Influence of Dr. Priestley.

At the beginning of the century the popular religion in this country, both in the Church and among Nonconformists, was of a strongly evangelical type, and for the most part Calvinistic, appealing as its ultimate authority to the Bible, as the divinely appointed and infallible oracle of religious truth. Appealing to the same authority, the Unitarians of that time made their protest, affirming that neither Trinity nor Atonement, as required by the popular "scheme of salvation," were to be found in the Bible; that in the Gospel of Jesus there was nothing "mysterious" or contrary to reason; that he had given a plain rule of life, stamped as divine by the attestation of his miracles, while the supreme miracle of his resurrection gave assurance of the heavenly life to all believers. The dominant influence among Unitarians was that of Dr. Priestley, whose theological system is described in the article "Unitarianism" (by the late J. Frederick Smith) in the Encyclopædia Britannica, as "a combination of Locke's philosophy with the crudest rationalistic supernaturalism." Priestley's was a noble influence, in his example of brave integrity and fearless search for truth, of earnest practical piety and self-sacrificing public service. His clear conviction of the truth of Unitarianism, as the right interpretation of Christ's life and teaching, and his perception of the nature and origin of the dogmatic creeds of the Church were of great service in laying down the right lines of thought on these matters; but many of his opinions and judgments and his whole philosophy of religion have long since been superseded. In Priestley's system there is no place for what we understand by inward apprehension of spiritual truth and direct personal communion with God. The natural man is shut out from immediate knowledge of divine things, which can only come to him through a revelation, miraculously furnished, and handed down in the Bible from the age of special inspiration. Thus the whole system was external and liable to sceptical attack—inevitably so from the first principles of the philosophy which Priestley had embraced. It could not permanently satisfy the religious needs of men.

There were, indeed, staunch Unitarians in that day, such as Robert Aspland and Lant Carpenter, touched with something of the evangelical spirit, and often among ministers and people were found a moral strength and ardour hardly warranted by their philosophy; but the tendency of the system was distinctly towards an intellectual hardness and a barrenness of spiritual life. By the very theory, the gifts of the Holy Spirit were confined to the first age of the Church. Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill, who was brought up amid the influences of the older Unitarianism, and as a young man broke away from it, has characterised it in these words: "It demanded obedience rather than encouraged communion, discountenanced all liveliness of religious affections, and frowned upon enthusiasm whether in the moral or the spiritual sphere."

The Influence of Dr. Channing.

But the century was not far advanced before a new and freshening impulse was given to the religious life of Unitarians. The year before Priestley's death, Channing began to preach in Boston, and in the following year (1805) James Martineau was born. From Channing came the impulse, which unsealed the fountains of a fuller inspiration in Martineau and in John Hamilton Thom, who with their elder friend, John James Tayler, became the leaders and quickeners of a new life in English Unitarianism. To the influence of Channing was added later that of the more spiritual philosophers of Germany.

How Channing regarded the teaching of the older Unitarianism we may see from the following letter, which he wrote in 1820, to the venerable Mrs. Cappe, of York, a friend of Theophilus Lindsey's, and widow of an old minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel:—

I occasionally see the Monthly Repository, and among the rational, sensible, and matter-of-fact communications which fill that work I have met now and then with pieces from a writer who seems to have made the discovery that Unitarianism and imagination and poetry are not irreconcilable foes. The author is one of Wordsworth's school. When I tell you that I incline to the heresy of this writer, and that I wish to see among Unitarians a development of imagination and poetical enthusiasm, as well as of the rational and critical power, you will not wonder at my curiosity in wishing to learn who this writer is.

I have before told you how much I think Unitarianism has suffered from union with a heart-withering philosophy. I will now add that it has suffered also from a too exclusive application of its advocates to biblical criticism and theological controversy, in other words, from a too partial culture of the mind. I fear that we must look to other schools for the thoughts which thrill us, which touch the most inward springs, and disclose to us the depths of our own souls.

Pardon me for finding so much fault. It is not owing, I hope, to censoriousness. I only wish that truth may be so presented as to be friendly to our whole nature; that it may develop, not chill, those powers which have always exercised the mightiest sway among men, and which seem most akin to inspiration.

A few years later and there was no doubt that Channing's desire for English Unitarians would be fulfilled. One has only to read the lectures in the Liverpool Unitarian Controversy of 1839, and notably Dr. Martineau's on "Christianity without Priest, and without Ritual," and Mr. Thom's on "The Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth," to see that a new power had arisen. Channing greeted it at once. Thus in 1840 he wrote to Harriet Martineau:—

You speak of your brother James. Since writing to you I have read all his lectures; and they seem to me among the noblest efforts of our times. They have quickened and instructed me. Indeed, his lectures and Mr. Thom's give me new hope for the cause of truth in England. Not that I expect any great immediate effect; but noble spiritual action in a few is an augury of good which cannot fail. I differ, as I think I told you, from some of your brother's expositions; but, no matter, I do not enjoy his mind the less.

And in the following year he wrote to Martineau himself:—

Old Unitarianism must undergo important modification or developments. Thus I have felt for years. Though an advance on previous systems, and bearing some better fruits, it does not work deeply, it does not strike living springs in the soul. This is perfectly consistent with the profound piety of individuals of the body. But it cannot quicken and regenerate the world.

Tayler, Martineau and Thom.

That was in the year before Channing's death. One likes to think what his delight would have been, if he could have read Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," the first volume of which appeared in 1843, and the articles which he, Mr. Tayler, Mr. Thom, and others, contributed to successive volumes of the Christian Teacher (1838-44), the Prospective Review (1845-54), and the National Review (1855-64), which in the middle period of the century were so powerful an educative force, laying firm foundations for a new faith in spiritual religion, and a fresh unfolding of Christian truth.

It is interesting to note that as early as 1830, in the annual sermon of the B. and F.U.A. the Rev. John James Tayler had shown that he was prepared for this great work. Preaching on "The Perpetuity of the Christian Dispensation viewed in its connection with the Progress of Society," he said:—

What we want are not the withered ethics of our Presbyterian forefathers nor the verbal and textual criticism of our immediate predecessors; but a practical application to manners and opinions as they exist, of the vital spirit of the Gospel, imbibed in deep and earnest meditation on the character and teachings of Christ, and breathed forth again on the dull and slumbering souls of men, in the sweet and searching tones of gentleness and love.

Creeds may perish, opinions disappear, and the whole face of society undergo a complete revulsion; but man and nature, and that divine will which created both, cannot change, and the truth which is built on them must be external.

There we have a distinct utterance of the new faith. Man is no longer regarded as naturally incapable of the apprehension of spiritual truth, needing a special miraculous revelation to assure him of facts otherwise beyond his reach, and which he must take on trust, on the ground of proof by miracle; but in himself, in his own nature, living in the natural world as God has ordered it, with the spiritual endowment given him from the same fountain of all good, he sees and knows for himself the meaning of the unseen things which are eternal.

Long afterwards Dr. Martineau said of Mr. Tayler in a memorial paper: "His religion was present and intuitive—a consciousness abiding and intense; an inward walk with Heaven; an ideal light upon the earth; a revelation of the spirit." "He owned the living God, in a living humanity."

This new conception of the innate religiousness of human nature did not make its way among Unitarians without conflict with the life-long convictions of the older generation. For a long time Tayler, Martineau, and Thom were regarded as rash and dangerous heretics, threatening to overturn the solid foundations of divine revelation and to destroy the Christian faith of the churches.

The conflicting views were clearly brought out at a great meeting of Unitarians from all parts of the country, summoned by the B. and F.U.A. and held in London in June, 1838. The feeling of the older men was well expressed by the Rev. Thos. Madge, when he said:—

I do not understand what is meant by "faith on conviction" and other vague, German, transcendental notions, which have been expressed. I wish to have everything stated plainly and clearly. [That is on the line of the old protest against mystery in religion.]

To him the Rev. James Martineau, then a young man of thirty-three, replied:—

The one great function of a religious body is, I apprehend, to generate faith—an absolute reliance, that is, upon internal convictions and truths of religion and morals, in opposition to external expediences—an undoubting self-abandonment, in action and affection, to some great idea, worth living or dying for. Every sect has prospered and deserved to prosper, in proportion as it has produced this disposition; it has failed and deserved to fail, in proportion as it has produced the opposite, and excited the critical, sceptical, disorganising temper.

And later in this most characteristic speech, having dealt with the question of organisation, as useless except where there was vigorous life to be organised, Mr. Martineau added:—

We want, it may be, not so much visible prosperity, as high faith and courage to go on without it—to act from conviction within, rather than from disappointment without.

And again he urged that there were two modes of action of chief moment for them, intimately connected with each other, the one intellectual, the other moral: "the continued exercise in matters of religion of perfectly free inquiry, unreproved by others' fears, and unrestricted by any authority foreign to the inquirers' mind; and the maintenance of that deep spirit of religion and of duty, which has its seat, not in the Christian's creed, but in his soul."

Mr. Thom was not at this meeting, but in the following month he brought out the first number of the new series of the Christian Teacher, a quarterly magazine, which he edited for several years. In that first number he wrote an article on: "How is Life to be maintained in the Unitarian Churches," based upon a report of the London meeting, and giving his own views on the subject. What was wanted, he said, was "strong interests, individual affections nourished by our individual faith; a religion nutritive, not combative; positive views and positive cultivation; the dwelling of our souls upon the spiritual realities we possess and hold dear, for the sake of developing the religious life within ourselves, and of drawing out into more abundant existence the fruits of our faith. . . . We want faith to make us forget our religious antipathies, and devote ourselves to our religious sympathies, to make us forget our repulsions and follow our attractions. We want a strong, unagitated, uncontroversial love for the Christianity we have ourselves embraced, the views which are our own gospel."

These do not sound to us the utterances of dangerous heretics; but it was a new language, the expression of a new life, in which the older Unitarians could not easily find themselves at home. This insisting on the inward apprehension of religious truth, and the ultimate authority of the Divine witness of the spirit within, appeared to them vague and dangerous, and a making light of the definite and tangible revelation of the Scriptures.

Our Great Gain.

We wonder now at that old suspicion of our prophets, which even as late as 1857 made a strong protest against entrusting the education of our ministers in Manchester New College to two such men as Tayler and Martineau. Looking back on those days makes us doubly thankful for the liberty which has been the continuing inheritance of our people, and in which all earnest life has room to grow.

What we have received from our teachers, for the enrichment of the spiritual life, in which we now rejoice, may best be seen not from any narrative, but simply by calling to mind some of the books which they have given us:—Such books as Mr. Tayler's "Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty," and his "Retrospect of the Religious Life of England"; Mr. Thom's book on the "Epistles to the Corinthians," his "Christ the Revealer," and "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ"; and Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," his great works on "Ethics" and "The Study of Religion," and "The Seat of Authority in Religion." Then from their followers we have received such books as Dr. Charles Beard's Hibbert Lectures, and his sermons, the Hibbert Lectures of Dr. James Drummond and Professor Upton, and Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," while into the same fellowship of a free spiritual faith has come the quickening of the sermons of Stopford Brooke.

During the last fifty years many questions have arisen, floods of new light on history and on the world of Nature have streamed in upon us. Religious interpretations have needed to be re-adjusted, and many old conceptions and beliefs have had to be abandoned. But we have found that our religion rests upon the true foundation. God is nearer to us in the marvellous order of Nature, as revealed by science, no longer in conflict with religion. The Bible is to us a more living witness of religious truth, while we have learnt to see how much there is of truth and beauty in other of the great religions of the world than our own. The grace and truth in Jesus Christ appeal to us with new power, while we have learnt to find all the divine revealing in his simple manhood.

Even Channing in 1841 declared that "without miracles the historical Christ is gone"; but when he added that the truth of Christ could not rest on the authority of miracles, but that the greatest evidence for miracles was in the character of the religion, he pointed the way by which the new light was to come.

We look back upon the history of our people, and think of the condition of our churches to-day. We remember what the fathers have taught us, and we are aware that through the goodness of God it rests with our own faithfulness to secure in these churches new and more vigorous life, instinct with joyous faith, rich in the most beautiful gifts of the spirit, strong in the fellowship of Christ, and earnestly bent on ministering to the needs of the world. Thinking of the past, we trust our freedom and glory in it, we trust the abiding spirit of a true humanity to bear us onward into a yet nobler future, because that spirit rests and must ever rest in the Spirit of the living God.

LONDON UNITARIAN BAZAAR.

FINAL MEETING OF THE COUNCIL.

THE final meeting of the Bazaar Council, to adopt the accounts, and the rules for the administration of the London Permanent Chapel Building Fund, drafted by the trustees, was held at Essex Hall on Monday evening, Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., in the chair.

In opening the proceedings the Chairman reminded the Council that it was in July, 1898, that their first meeting was held, to consider the holding of a bazaar, and he congratulated them on the great success achieved. Before the Bazaar opened they had received just over £10,000. in donations, and the Bazaar and subsequent sales cleared, roughly speaking, £3,400, while expenses were not much more than £500, which was highly satisfactory. £9,000 had been assigned to the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, and the remainder, according to the original scheme, to the London District Unitarian Society, for the benefit of existing churches. The trustees of the Building Fund, in accordance with a resolution of the Council held in July, had considered various schemes of administration, and at first inclined to the method of incorporation, but following the example of the American Chapel Building Fund, and the Congregational Building Fund, had finally decided that it would be best simply to adopt a set of rules for the administration of the Fund, and the draft would be immediately submitted for their approval.

Mr. FRANK PRESTON presented the treasurers' statement, which showed that donations and congregational contributions had amounted to £10,074 7s. 2d. Entertainments before and at the Bazaar realised £316 17s. 9d. Bank interest produced £97 6s. 7d., and the Bazaar itself and subsequent sales £3,428 7s. 5d., giving a total of £13,916 18s. 11d. The expenses included £150 for the rent of the King's Hall, an honorarium to the secretary of £105, which they all felt to be more than deserved, and altogether amounted to £572 4s. 11d., so that the net result gained was £13,344 14s. There were still some small amounts to come in, which would bring the total to at least £13,400, after which the accounts would be duly audited.

On the motion of Mr. H. B. Lawford, seconded by Mr. Titford, it was agreed that the treasurers' accounts be received and adopted, subject to audit. It was also agreed that any further sums received be held by the L.D.U.S. in the same manner as the £4,344 already in hand, and that as soon as the accounts are finally closed a full statement should be printed and circulated among subscribers and helpers at the Bazaar.

On the motion of Mr. Titford, seconded by Mr. S. S. Tayler, heartiest congratulations and thanks were accorded to the treasurers for their services to the Fund. Mr. Frank Preston, on behalf of Mr. Frederick Nettlefold and himself, acknowledged the vote.

On the motion of Mr. H. Epps, seconded by Mrs. Clennell, warm thanks were accorded to all workers at the Bazaar, and also to the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who acted as secretary, and to whom so much of its success was due. It was stated that some pictures from the Art stall were still unsold, and were placed in the hands of Mr. G. H. Clennell to be disposed of. If unsold, they might be given to the Missions. There were also some Books of the Bazaar to be had at the Book Room, and about fifty hats, of which Mr. Sudbery had taken charge. Mr. Clennell stated that of the amount placed at the disposal of the L.D.U.S. £1,900 had already been granted, and applications were in hand involving a total expenditure of £4,200, so that any other pending application should be made at once.

The CHAIRMAN announced that Mr. Frank Preston had been appointed treasurer of the Permanent Building Fund, and that the £9,000 devoted to the Fund had been at once favourably invested.

The rules for the administration of the Fund were then submitted and adopted. They included the appointment of Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., as President; Dr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., as Chairman; Mr. Frank Preston, Treasurer; and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Secretary. It is provided that the fundamental rule, which declares that the Fund is to be used for the purchase of sites and the erection thereon of buildings with open trusts, cannot be altered. No part of the Fund is to be bestowed as a gift, but the trustees may, if they think fit, remit the payment of interest.

Cordial votes of thanks to the Chairman and the Secretaries, Mrs. Blake Odgers and Miss L. Martineau, brought the meeting to a close.

A CHRISTMAS REVERIE.

"So hallow'd and so gracious is the time."

How good it is for us in these rushing days to pull up and pause at Christmas. It is good for us to quietly still our hearts, and let Christmas thoughts have free way with us: to spare if only half an hour in sitting over a fender and gazing into a sympathetic fire.

What does Christmas mean?

It means to the general Christian the birth of Christ in Bethlehem (Nazareth still being robbed of its claim), the advent of the Saviour of men, the sacred anniversary of the most supernatural event in history.

It means to the official theologian the Incarnation, God come down in human form, the Word made flesh, Immanuel, God with us.

It means to our own affection childhood, motherhood, fatherhood, Annunciations, Nativities, Madonnas, all the hallowed familiarity of home and family; to our imagination it stands for legend and romance, poetry and a sweet wonder story, the lonely hills, and the sleeping flocks, the waiting angels and the watching shepherds, the silent night and the star-lit radiance, the sudden voice of a heavenly host.

It means to our associations with the past joyous old English games and customs, the holly branch and the mistletoe bough, the Yule-log and the Christmas-tree, quaint Noel carols and midnight carollers, merry bells in old village churches, simple worshippers on bended knees; whilst to our present practice it means, moreover, goodwill and good cheer, greetings to friends far and near, gracious charities to the poor, and an opening of the heart a little wider to brother and neighbour.

There is a wealth of warm religion, social feeling, personal memory in all these things which no Scrooge, nor yet all his tribe, can ever steal from our hearts, or turn into dross. For, year by year, these memories mellow down a little more, as our joy has to be tempered with sorrow (oh! how bitter is the sorrow this year!); and hence these associations cling a little more closely, a little more pathetically, yet not without joy; and all this rich Christian sentiment, which we partly inherit, partly create, what is it but the very poetry of life, freshening monotony and melancholy away, keeping the old world still young as a child, renewing interest and expectancy, and our hope for humanity. Does not our modern life, in London especially, need sorely the spontaneity, the simplicity, the open-hearted informality of a homelier day? It is cramped by convention and prosperity, spoiled by ostentation and luxury, chilled by social pride, and starved by reserve. May not most of us, who are but matter of fact and commonplace, who worship expediency and common sense, live for outward results, crave for outward success, judge everything by statistics, and expect to be saved by our works—may not we, perhaps, at Christmas feel a little more tolerant towards those who have higher aims, a little less impatient with those who live for ideals, are not ashamed to dream dreams, and not affrighted by defeats. Christ stands for idealism and Christmas stands for Christ.

Yes, Christmas means Christ: but in a special and spiritual way, surely, without realising which we know him imperfectly, and without reaching which we miss the secret of Christmas Day. The usual titles we bestow on Jesus partly reveal him to us, but partly hide him away.

He is "the central figure in history": not because of the space or importance which he holds in the world's long records, but because he touched the highest in humanity, and remains its purest type to-day.

He is "the Founder of Christianity"; but if by Christianity we mean either a code of conduct or a creed of doctrine, he was something more and better. From neither can we deduce the true Jesus.

He is "the Great Teacher," and we make much of the teachings of Jesus, many of which may be quoted from his predecessors. But to think of him as a teacher alone, a purveyor of precepts, an instructor in religion and morals, a preacher of homilies on the graces and virtues, a narrator of parables, is to do him scant justice.

He is "the Great Exemplar," a model whom we may copy, a pattern to whom we may look back, and "Back to Jesus" is just now a popular cry. But no amount of imitation becomes real possession; only that is our own which we ourselves form. He is rather a prompter of our spiritual ambition, a challenger to the greatness in every man, an advancing figure always leading us like an angel presence, lighting us through the mist. "Christ in front," and we in pursuit, should be our thought.

These and other titles do but half reveal Jesus. The specific element in Jesus, that which is absolutely original and inevitably vital, is to be found always, not in his teachings of themselves, nor in his pattern image however precious, but in his own free personality lying behind the outward, embodying the truth in flesh and blood, revealing it in a life with God, which has ever since gleamed as the light of the world. And whatever is original and germinal in Christ has hence been the essence of Christianity ever since. Christianity is an enshrined personality; it began as a personal force, aroused personal allegiance, is still a free appeal from Christ's personality to ours, and its end is a personal God in communion with our personal being. In all life, human and divine, personality is the ultimate medium of apprehension, the mediator between God and man, the interpreter of men to each other. Ideas, truths, however great in themselves, either meander in vacant space, or slumber on library shelves, until they are made flesh and look at us through human eyes and speak to us with thrilling voice. Abstract truths may exist in their own right, but life truths must present themselves with personal guarantees. Neither ethics nor theology can ever really save anybody until they are seen and felt in some interpreting personality. And we have learnt all this from Jesus.

But what was the inner secret then of his own personal being? Was it not an intense realisation, a consciousness which became supreme, that the sense of God within him was itself divine, a very part of God's life mingled with his, the word made flesh, a fact, not a figure of speech, a knowledge flooding his whole being with such full realisation that he could exclaim "I and my Father are one." That was his personality, individual intensely yet one with God, eternal yet held in a passing world. Call the notion anthropomorphism, or any other affrighting name, but you cannot resist the feeling that God was in him, not represented by him, not revealed through him, but personally there in his personal nature, just as surely as his creative power is present in the world of matter.

That was the realisation of incarnation; not the doctrine of "the Incarnation," for that is irregularly limited to Jesus alone, but the incarnation of God in man, realised in Jesus pre-eminently, but present in all humanity. That is no theologian's creed but the ineffable central truth of the world, the point on which turns all man's inner knowledge of God, the very essence of all religious consciousness. And there is the key to Christ's personality, as it is to ours when the same mind is within us: this secret was his discovery: this is the holy of holies of Christianity: this is the deepest truth, the greatest gift of Christmas Day, putting an unspoken sanctity into even merriest festivity, and glorifying the children's carnival into a festival of the soul.

AN OLD CHRISTMAS CAROLL.

From an old volume, dating from early in the sixteenth century. The Caroll is prefixed to a translation of Sermons by Thomas à Kempis on "The Incarnation and Passion."

O SWEETEST Jesus
Come from Heaven,
That life might to the world
Be given.
Of thee I'le write, of thee I'le reade:
Thee will I seeke, thee will I sing,
Jesus my dearest Lord,
My Kinge.
Thou pardon'st much
To Lovers that Once loving thee, forsake
Thee not.
Who loves not thee
What doth he here?
Who feastes in thee, he makes
Good cheere!
O Manger-Heaven!
Wherein the price
Of thousand worlds so poore-ly lyes.
Which now appeares,
And now lyes hidde,
And then is knowen when published.
'Tis Soules delight,
'Tis all our Glorie,
Jesus, to reade thyne humble
Storie.
Thou gavest it once,
Whilest here thou wert
Still to be kept in faith-full hart.
Lets now reioyce;
Loe Christ is here
Let Captive soules putt off their feare.
Though lost indeed
And cast in gayle
Our Christ is come to be our Bayle.
I naked was (Yet knew it not)
Blind, lame, and poore, ah
heavie lott!
But Doctour Christ
Is kindly come
To cure the Lame, the blind, the Dumme.
O how Thou lovest
Us Father mild!
To send, for Doctour, such a child.
To quench our heates
To heale our woundes
And drayne the humour which abounds.
O Jesu deare!
Whose heavenly light
Makes day appear amidst our night.
Thou art our priest,
Our sacrifice,
To cure the sinfull soule
which dyes.
But, ô I'le aye
This Carroll singe,
I'me brother now to Christ
My King.
Grant Jesu, grant
My hart may be
A burning Sacryfice
To Thee.

OBITUARY.

LORD O'HAGAN.

WITH deep regret, which will be especially felt within the circle of our household of faith, we have to record the death of Lord O'Hagan. He succumbed last week at Springfontein, near the Orange River, to an attack of enteric fever, contracted while on duty near that place with a detachment of his regiment of Grenadier Guards.

Thomas Towneley, second Baron O'Hagan in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, was the son of the first Baron, who was twice Lord Chancellor of Ireland, by his second wife, Alice Mary, youngest daughter of Colonel Towneley, of Towneley, Lancashire, and of Lady Caroline, daughter of the second Earl of Sefton. He was born on Dec. 5, 1878, and succeeded to the title in 1885.

After the regular course of military studies at Sandhurst, Lord O'Hagan received a commission in the Grenadier Guards, and shortly afterwards was ordered to proceed to Gibraltar on garrison duty. He was there for a year, and his superior officers have since testified to the zeal and intelligence with which he devoted himself to the duties of his profession during his stay at that important outpost of the Empire. On his return home he was promoted to the rank of First-Lieutenant. But meanwhile the war in South Africa was beginning to assume a serious character, and many officers of the Guards were being ordered to the front. Soon his own turn came, and within a few days his preparations were made and he was on his way. At Capetown he only remained a few hours, and proceeded at once to the Modder River to join the 3rd Battalion of the Grenadiers under Lord Methuen. From that moment, his movements followed the vicissitudes of the campaign. He took part in the relief of Kimberley, was at Paardeberg, accomplished with the Guards the famous march from Paardeberg to Bloemfontein; later he entered Pretoria with Lord Roberts; then after various expeditions around the capital, he was sent to Koomatipoort, then back again to Pretoria and Bloemfontein. At last a portion of his battalion was sent down to defend the railway line and some drifts on the Orange River. It is there that after a campaign, so far gone through in spite of many risks, he caught the fatal fever. He was removed to the Hospital at Springfontein, but the disease had already progressed beyond hope of recovery.

Thus has ended a young life, full of promise, not so much on account of Lord O'Hagan's high social position, as on account of the nobleness, dignity, and unaffected simplicity of his character. At an age when religious impressions have usually had no time to manifest themselves fully, Lord O'Hagan had embraced with singular lucidity and moral courage the principles for which our Free Churches stand, and those who have known him best are able to realise the great loss which his untimely death represents for the future welfare of our cause. It is, however, a consolation to know that he is succeeded in the title and family influence by his brother, the Hon. Maurice Towneley O'Hagan, who, like himself, is earnestly devoted to the interests of our liberal faith. He is at present an undergraduate of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Only recently, Lady O'Hagan was welcomed at Essex Hall on her return from South Africa. She had gone out last year in the hope that while engaged in nursing work she might be nearer to her gallant son. When the news came that the Guards had been ordered home, she hastened to embark for England to be in time to receive her son on his return, and had the war been really at an end Lord O'Hagan would in all probability have been here safe and well by this time.

The hearts of all will go to the poor stricken mother in a case so sad and pathetic, and many prayers will be offered that the faith for which she and her children have witnessed so bravely in the past, may now be her strength and consolation in this hour of trial.

The death of Lord O'Hagan is a keen loss to the congregation of the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, of which he was a member. Exactly a year ago, he attended service for the last time, and bade his friends an affectionate farewell, prior to sailing with his regiment for South Africa. Last Sunday morning, preaching on the subject of "Providence," the Rev. Alexander Farquharson gave expression to the prevailing grief, making a most touching reference to his lordship's sad death, and paying a high tribute to his memory. At the conclusion of the service, the "Dead March" in Saul was played.

CHRISTMAS, 1900.

IT is the season when the sons of Man—
If all the herald-angels sang was truth—
With one accord should praise the holy plan
That gives the victory to peace and ruth.

But this poor World must tarry yet a while And mar the order, yet, wherein she rolls;
Her anxious children rather sigh than smile,
And loving calm must seek it in their souls.

Christmas, this year, brings other moods than these.
For angel-hymns we hear the cannon roar;
The cries of street-boys vending victories,
And all the cruel harmony of War.

The Nation is increased, but not the joy,
Our dear ones die beyond the Ocean flood;
And, for the smiling of a heavenly Boy,
We have parted spoil and garments rolled in blood.

Lift up your hearts! and cast your fears away,
He snaps the bow and bids the battle
cease;
So shall the stormy night bring shining morn,
And cares of conflict found the reign of peace.

THE POPE'S VISION.

FOR OLDER CHILDREN.

A MILLION pounds sounds a large price for a picture; but if it is true, as I have heard, that our British Government offered a million pounds for a certain picture I saw in Germany last summer, it was very wise and very economical of them to do so. Because this is a picture that can speak, and one that speaks so clearly and so beautifully that, for my part, I should not be surprised if it would have saved us more than sixty million pounds in this one year alone. Now, I will try to tell you a little of what it told me; and someday I hope you will see it too, and that it will speak to you as it did to me. It will not tell you just the same as it told me, for it speaks differently to everybody—very simply to simple people, and more wisely to more learned ones, and to some people it will not speak at all.

Now I will tell you in my own words, as nearly as I can, what the picture said: Once upon a time there lived an old Roman Catholic Pope. Now the Pope, as you know, was at one time ruler and minister over the whole Christian Church. He was supposed to be the Shepherd of all the people of the world, and it was his business to rule, to teach, to guide all Christians until his Master himself came back to earth.

One day overcome by the sorrows of this world, and feeling as though the dark clouds of life were too heavy to be endured, and so thick as to hide from us the faintest gleam of heaven, at last almost in despair he sank on his knees and began to pray for light. He knelt down before a great window, which opened out where nothing could be seen but the sky and clouds. As he prayed for light he drew aside the great curtains and looked out, but the heavens looked dark and wintry, and he felt as though there were no God to answer his prayers.

But presently there came into his mind the thought of a young saint who had lived a beautiful Christian life in dark heathen ages—her name was Barbara—and when still quite a girl she was very good and beautiful and already wonderfully learned. But her father was so proud of her scholarship and so much afraid that her beauty would lead her among the pleasures and distractions of society, amidst which her learning might be forgotten, that he had a great tower built for her, where she was shut away from the world and lived alone with her books. She did not feel lonely however, because to her the books seemed alive, and through them she seemed to be always speaking with men and women she had never seen—till at last she felt as though she were living among the very best companions of all the ages.

Now about the time when she was grown to womanhood she read the story of the young carpenter who preached about the love of God and the beauty of His world, until he was crucified by his countrymen.

After this she became a Christian, because she seemed to have found her true Master, who could teach her all that was truly worth knowing, and whose cause was the most worthy of all to be served. But angry indeed was her heathen father when he knew of her conversion, for it seemed to him worse than all the follies of the world he had shut her from. So determined was he to turn her from her new faith that he ordered her to be cruelly tortured, and when this would not make her deny her religion, with his own hands he put her to death. Then, says the legend, the anger of Heaven was shown there and then by a flash of lightning which killed the merciless father where he stood.

To this day the Catholic sailor, we are told, will pray to Saint Barbara for help amid the storm when the clouds are dark and the lightning flashes. And indeed, amidst the dark old ages of heathen cruelty and ignorance, it is a gentle brave woman, such as the beautiful young Barbara, who seems to be a gleam of light to show us that in all ages of the world there were good and saintly men and women who loved truth and duty to God above everything else on earth.

No wonder, then, that as the Pope gazed up sorrowfully into the dull sky, the first gleam of light which seemed to come into his soul was the memory of a saint like Barbara, who was counted the saint of light amidst clouds and storms. Then as she seemed to be there before him, he began to pray to her, and hope came back again until he dared to ask her, as I think, to open the heavens and show him the very face of God Himself.

Could even Saint Barbara do this? Can the most holy saint, either dead or living, reveal to the eyes or to the soul of mortal man the vision of Him who created the heavens and the earth? That must depend upon ourselves. The saints and teachers of every age may take us by their thoughts and by their lives to the place where God is; but it depends upon our lives and thoughts, upon our gift of seeing whether when we are carried into God's presence we can see Him there or not.

But Barbara, knowing that the Pope was himself a saint, smiles back at him in answer to his prayer, and her smile seems to carry him out under the open sky; earth melts away, and he finds himself buried in the impenetrable clouds of heaven. But a growing light all about him shines through more and more, until suddenly the mists scatter and break; two beautiful children come running, flying with baby wings past the Pope, between him and Saint Barbara, and settle on his very window-sill. Then as the heavy clouds all sink down beneath his bended knees, his papal crown in reverence removed from his grey locks, he looks up eagerly towards the light.

And did he see God? No man can answer that, for the highest visions of each soul can never be retold. But, in the picture, he is looking up in rapt joy, as though his whole soul were singing with wonder and love, and rising up like a flame of pure prayer to the God of Love.

And what is it that the picture shows as the answer to his prayer that he might see God? Is it something which shall clear away the clouds and darkness of this sad earth and show to us all amongst the doubts and trials of life that Light of heaven by which the universe is moved in love? All that the picture shows is a simple young mother carrying her baby boy.

And is that all the Pope is looking at? What marvel can it be that strikes such wonder and such joy deep into his heart? Is the mother's brow girt with a crown of flashing gold and priceless stones? Does she tread upon the clouds with queenly, conquering might? Or is there some unearthly light of power and pride or more than mortal wisdom in her gaze? No; she is only a woman simply clad, the robe thrown over her head, half carried from her by the breeze of heaven. She is only a young girl, stepping half timid upon the soft clouds of heaven and pressing her cheek gently against the brow of her child. And he is looking out as his mother does, solemn and silent, into the mysteries of heaven, of life, of God; fearless only in the knowledge of an Almighty power whose love upholds the universe. Yet to see even this much in the picture is to see behind what is painted there, for there is nothing more wonderful than a young mother whose pure gaze seems to protect her from the world's wickedness and despair, and in her arms a little boy resting in his mother's love and with the dawn of manhood's nobility already on his face.

Only a mother and her child! Yet the the old man and the young saint as they look at them find themselves lifted above the clouds of earth into the light of eternal heaven. God's messengers prepare their way, and the soft mists which yield to their approach are radiant with myriad angel faces.

To the Catholic Pope this may have seemed indeed the vision of God, for to him it was no ordinary mother, no ordinary child; but according to his belief, Jesus, even as a little child, was actually God Himself. But can his vision be to us a revelation of life's eternal Light? In an earthly mother and her earthly child can we see God? Perhaps very few of us can. And yet the young artist who painted the picture must have been able to, because, no matter what his creed, he himself must have painted from the real living mothers and children he had known. The little herald angels, we are told, are portraits of two small boys who used to watch the painter from a window opposite his studio. Something about the ordinary people he met must have seemed to him so beautiful that he felt he was looking straight at God Himself, when he saw simple women with their little children. To the young artist, who was called Raphael the Divine, the whole of this life was like a great and wondrous picture of God's painting. And the reason why he could see so much more beauty and holiness in ordinary things than most people can, was because he himself was a creator of beautiful and holy things. Thus he came to know God just as we may come to know Raphael—not by really seeing his face, but by knowing and loving his works, until he seems a very near and real companion and teacher.

And we, too, may come to know God like this. For though we cannot all be great painters or writers, yet if we try to live truly and beautifully we shall sometimes feel, when alone in the fields, or looking at the stars, or when in the presence of simple people with hearts of love, as though we were actually talking with God and looking at Him face to face. We can never really see His face with our eyes, or hear His voice with our ears; yet He speaks to us, and we see Him, in all the wonder and beauty of His works, and most of all in the faces of those we love, like the mother and the little child in that great picture.

BUT YET REJOICE.

THE last Christmas of the century! And dare we rejoice in it, with the heavy cloud still hanging over South Africa, with the vivid memory of all the agony that war must always bring, and the haunting dread that there must have been too much truth in the reports of those cruel things done by our troops to defenceless women and children in the work of "pacification" of the country; and whatever our judgment or suspense of judgment as to the responsibility for this disastrous conflict, the knowledge of so many broken hearts and silent homes, so many hearts embittered, and the terrible legacy of suffering and loss, of distrust and grievous fears for the future well-being of the country—remembering these things, can we dare to rejoice?

And yet if we dare not, the hope of the world is dead. For this joy of our Christmas thanksgiving is no selfish joy. It is the gladness of pure, unselfish love. It is a going out from self, in helpfulness, in heartfelt sympathy, a welcoming once more of that purer spirit of humanity, which came with the little child of Nazareth, and which none of the cruelty, the treachery, the base dishonour of the world has been able to destroy. Even if we are down-cast and ashamed, we must not shut out from our hearts and homes, or from the thanksgiving in our churches, the light and gladness of that better advent. We may confess our own unworthiness, we may accept the stern rebuke, which the glance of that little child may bring to our hearts, and yet we must be glad that Love is still supreme, and GOD is in His heaven.

One service, surely, in the immediate stress of this time, Christmas may render to us, breaking down the barriers of pride, of enmity, and all cruel selfishness. "Love your enemies, even though you are convinced that they have wronged you. Nay, love your enemies—which is far harder—even if you must bitterly confess that you have wronged them, and that the wrong is irreparable. See that you understand them, that you reckon with what this war and their defeat must be to them, and so choose what shall be your policy of conciliation, of self-restraint, without resentment, in single-hearted determination to do what is best for the whole country."

It may seem to us that the century draws to its close in gloom; not in progress, but in turning back to some things of worldliness, of prejudice and passion and barbarism, which we had thought our country had long left behind; we may be inclined to take to ourselves those sad lines of TENNYSON's :—

> No doubt vast eddies in the flood
> Of onward time shall yet be made,
> And throned races may degrade.

And yet we must look beyond the immediate dismay to a better hope. And most of all at this season, looking back over many years, remembering the old familiar voices, the love and rejoicing that have filled our homes, with each succeeding generation the music of the children's voices, the strength and fearless integrity, the gentle unselfishness which have ministered in the world, the beautiful graces, the holy light, which have illumined lives of lowly discipleship, now passed into that deep silence, so eloquent of the things of GOD, where in truth they are now hidden, with CHRIST, in GOD—a world in which these things have been, and are, does not go permanently back, or lose its confidence in the ultimate victory of right and love.

This, TENNYSON knew full well, after he had triumphed over his own personal sorrow.

> Love is and was my Lord and King,
> And in his presence I attend
> To hear the tidings of my friend,
> Which every hour his couriers bring.
> Love is and was my King and Lord,
> And will be, tho' as yet I keep > Within his court on earth, and sleep
> Encompass'd by his faithful guard,
> And hear at times a sentinel
> Who moves about from place to place,
> And whispers to the worlds of space,
> In the deep night, that all is well.

That is a message for every one, to whom this Christmas season must bring deep, personal sorrow. There is more than sorrow in the holy silence. There is the word of consolation and undying hope, and the revealing which only love can give.

And whoever has learnt that lesson of the inward life, which is with GOD, cannot despair of the world. Thus the joy of Christmas, bringing benediction to our homes, must at the same time strengthen us as citizens, as brethren of every nation of the earth, to hold fast to righteousness with undaunted faith, to seek peace, and to pursue it.

A CHRISTMAS VISION.

IN the early gloom of a wintry day,
When the snowflakes hid the sky,
With a cheery word, and a merry laugh,
The town-folk hastened by.

But the road of life had been rough for me,
And I dreaded the time to come;
For a burden of care was mine to bear,
As I wended in silence home.

'Twas a Christmas-Eve, and memory tells
How I welcomed the fire-light's gleam,
When after my toil there came a rest,
And out of the rest, a dream!

For a calm unwonted around me fell,
Enthralling each weary sense,
And my troubled heart with gladness owned
Its compassionate influence.

Then a vision arose, and there swept a spell
Of sacredness through the air,
As the mind's mysterious realm revealed
A Presence before me there!

In a shimmering beam of wondrous light,
So real and fair to see,
Was a visage, recalled from pictures old,
And tenderly bent on me.

Then my spirit thrilled with a fear new-born,
For I knew his deathless name
By the thorny crown he once had worn
Through Calvary's day of shame.

In his gentle arms, to his bosom kind
He folded a motherless child;
While a little one clung to his raiment white,
And looked up at him, and smiled.

But I dared not speak, and I scarce could pray;
There was selfishness in my pain,
And the vision divine seemed meaningless,
For I wore the world's hard chain.

With a look unearthly sweet he stilled
My pitiful restlessness,
And my tears welled up, as the waters flowed
From the rock in the wilderness.

Then he whispered soft,—"O cease to-night
From the trouble thy soul within;
And renew thy life in love's dear light,
And gather the children in!"

Then, methought, I became as a little child,
And I opened the portal wide,
To welcome them in, from the cold and the dark,
To the glory of Christmastide.

And amid their glee, by the Christmas tree,
The cares and the fears I bore,
On the ripples of laughter drifted afar,
And my heart was glad once more.

UNTO US A SON.

UNTO us a Child is born,
When the light has gone away,
While the wintry dark is here,
And the woodland lies forlorn,
And the skies are wan and grey,
And the seas are tempest-driven,
In the midnight of the year
Unto us a Son is given.

Unto us a Child is born,
When the life within doth drowse,
Weary from the failing fight,
And the spirit over-worn
Low in desolation bows,
By invading languors riven,
In the midwatch of a night,
Unto us a Son is given.

Father! since the Child is born,
Now we speak Thy Perfect Name.
Grant of Thy dear charity
All the mercy of this morn
O'er our hearts may keep its claim,
Lifting them on wings to heaven:
That ourselves Thy sons may be,
Unto us Thy Son be given.

A. B.

THE OLD, OLD STORY.

BEHOLD how he loved. The old, old story of Jesus and his love. The sensation one experiences on Christmas Day is that of a traveller, who, after traversing a long dark tunnel in a stifling atmosphere, comes almost suddenly upon the full blaze and light of day, and into the sweet fresh air. The life and teaching of Christ, i.e., Christianity pure and simple, comes upon us at this season like a blaze of light, like the sweet fresh air. All controversies, theories, disputes, wranglings, coldnesses, and mutual suspicions are passed through like things of darkness that have emitted a dank, suffocating atmosphere, and we see the simple, pure, bright light of the Truth, we breathe the life-giving air. Christianity is love—and it is nothing else. And love is like God's blessed rain and sunshine, blessing all alike, the evil and the good, the just and the unjust—and its one distinguishing mark is that it never faileth. Who could be found to deny that on this choicest of all the days of the year?

We have tried everything, and it has failed—that is a very common remark made by Christian society (but not generally on Christmas Day) through the mouth of its magistrates, judges, schoolmasters, parsons, and all sorts and conditions of men; therefore we must punish, we must fine, we must impress, we must scourge, we must kill. But O Christian society, Christianity is love, and it never faileth. At any other time people would say "Yes, that is a truism, and, therefore, we neglect to heed it." At this season, with something different in the very air, it appears as a divine truth, and if we are not indeed disposed even yet to heed it, we yet feel as if it would be a blessed thing if we could heed it, and if we could catch some of the magic and enchantment of the thing.

The world at this season is like a great child asking, "Is the old, old story a true story?" or seems to be saying, "Tell me the old, old story until it proves itself at last a true story." What is it to love? What manner of man was it who introduced this new reign of light and love? It is a strange thing that there should ever have been any doubt as to what manner of man he was, as to what he said or did, or as to the import of what he said and did. Behold the man! God too! was He? How delightful! Yet why quarrel about it? The grave will soon enough help the reluctant unbelief of some of us. Meantime how opulent we are. Behold the man! Behold how he loved! Would he fight, would he sanction fighting, would he use violence under any circumstances? It sounds like a gross desecration to ask such a question.

"But suppose, but suppose," vociferates the world, "that reason failed to settle disputes" (though it is notorious that it is generally not reason that fails, it is temper), "would he not naturally resort to violence? No! O Christian society, when reason failed, he would resort to love. And become the laughing-stock of the civilised world? Very likely. But all the same he would not fail. A bruised reed would he not break, and the smoking flax would he not quench, he would bring forth judgment in truth. He would not fail nor be discouraged till he had set judgment in the earth. And even when civilisation has done its utmost, its best and its worst to bring people to reason, and beholds the devastation of its violence, it yet trusts that even so amity, peace and good understanding will spring from such a soil. Such a faith at least deserves to remove its mountain. Extend the question into matters of trespasses against the state or person. He would not kill, starve, torture, scourge, fine, imprison, ostracise. Under his sway we have actually ceased for the most part to scourge, starve and torture; we shall ere long cease also to kill, fine, imprison, ostracise.

The word which Jesus puts in place of punish is forgive. True, love might not suddenly accomplish now all that it seems to promise, but even in its negative effect it would be triumphant, it would leave no black legacy such as force leaves behind it, of hatred, suspicion, fear, revenge. There are two ways of ruling, of teaching, of doing anything as regards conduct: one is to drive and punish, the other is to allure and forgive, or as Goldsmith so immortally expresses it, "to allure to brighter worlds and lead the way." And indeed if we ourselves lived, as a normal thing, in brighter worlds, we should, as a normal thing, also allure others there, and lead the way.

The Christ-like mind. What is it? The mind that will not even entertain thoughts that lead to violence, force, compulsion, that will not harbour revenge, malice, envy, pride, that never desires to punish, but only to forgive, that knows no fear, that seeks no reward, for trust and love contain in themselves their own exceeding great reward—the peace of trust, and the joy of love. If these things do not come home to us as true at this season, it is to be feared they never will: for now we try to set aside the great absorbing cares and tragedies, and trials and sorrows, and, emptying our hearts of much perilous stuff, we turn and become, at least for a few hours, as little children, light-hearted, full of leisure, and like the children full of mirth too, for who would carry the burden of tragedy and business and mourning into their presence? And perhaps some day having wisely chosen to turn and become as a little child, we shall choose to abide by our choice, and walk in that path of trust and love and peace, with even a gay and a merry heart, making every day Christmas Day, every day lived as a child lives it.

Meantime our seasons "of clear shining" of the Christian Truth are as sparse as the red berries (the emblem of love) amidst their sea of green (the emblem of evergreen hope). Well, it is a blessed thing that there is this season, especially when the heart turns spontaneously to its true polarity—wearied of all else it turns like a child for its old, old story—of a man from God with God's own love in his heart, teaching us to fill our human homes with the light of the Eternal Home, that so

> Old friends, old scenes may lovelier be,
> As more of heaven in each we see.

MORE ABUNDANT LIFE.

"I CAME," said Jesus, "that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." Measured by years his own life was but a meagre one. It did not reach half the term set forth by the Psalmist as the allotted span. Yet, as we think of that life, although by far the greater part of it is veiled in the silence of Nazareth, we have no sense of poverty or insufficiency. Our impression of what it was is, of course, derived from what we read in the Gospels, and when we note the brief space of time covered by the Evangelical narratives, we marvel at the result. According to a view once prevalent, the active life of Jesus extended over something like three years; closer study of the records reduces this estimate by more than half. Fifteen or sixteen months are all that elapsed between the baptism and the crucifixion. And of the doings and sayings of the Master during most of even this brief period we are told nothing. Dr. Martineau computes that the words and the events of only thirty-five days are related by the Synoptical writers. Thirty-five days of thought and love, of sacred teaching and holy ministry, of self-sacrifice for man and communion with God—thirty-five days, broken by wide gaps of silence—from the chronicle of these we receive our impression of the life of Jesus. And yet who does not feel that that life was large, glorious, abundant! In meditating upon it, we forget the paucity of hours the Gospels include; we wonder that in any career on earth should be comprised such a succession of spiritual experiences as are here revealed—emotions of unspeakable pity and sorrow, of deep, strange joy and exultation, of longing for human welfare, of love towards the unseen yet ever-present Father. How vivid and poignant are its more salient moments! How intensely he lived in them—while he wrestled with temptation in the wilderness, while he spoke the pregnant sentences of the Sermon on the Mount, while he agonised and triumphed in Gethsemane! Such, indeed, were "crowded hours"—or crowded moments—"of glorious life," with more of life in them than is to be found in the whole existence, through however many years prolonged, of a torpid mind, a dull heart, a mean, selfish unaspiring spirit, a soul unstirred by human sympathies, insensible to the calls and the visitations of God.

And does not this view of the life of Jesus help us to understand in what way he is, or may be, a channel of more abundant life? The man who is imbued with his spirit, having been inspired by his words and touched by the power of his example, is impelled to sympathy and service, and so is made a partaker of life in which otherwise he would have had no part. The man whose spiritual vision is cleared, whose spiritual sensibilities are quickened, by contemplating Jesus in prayer and in communion with a God who is nearer than any human friend, is enabled to realise that he, too, is related to a universe of thought and love to which before he was a stranger, and in which his soul finds uplifting and joy such as those who have not been awakened to their sonship cannot know. And herein, what an amplitude of life!

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best. J. C. HIRST.

CRADLE THOUGHTS AT CHRISTMAS.

IT is the Festival of Childhood. We recall not the pains and struggles of the life and death of Jesus, but his babyhood, when Mary, the simple peasant woman of Nazareth, brought forth her first-born son, and she and Joseph the carpenter, looked upon the young child, and thought of all that might be the outcome of this fresh gift from God, so pure, so holy, so full of possibilities—thought of many things, and pondered them in their hearts, but thought of nothing so wonderful as the reality before them and the destined beauty of his life.

And when we ponder on the promise of life in a young child given to us in our day—how great the vision! how glorious the hope! What added confidence and blessed expectation are ours because of the birth of a baby nineteen hundred years ago in Palestine! We look at the tiny baby in its cradle, which depends upon our care for its life; and think that the inspired genius, the philosopher, the man of indomitable will, once lay thus: Cromwell, Shakespeare, Plato once needed the constant care and watchfulness of nurse or mother, and the promise of their life might have been blighted by carelessness. What blessing for mankind may be incarnated in the little child you call yours! Why is it here? What is its part in the world's being and doing?

You can help or hinder it in its most sensitive period: during its years of helplessness and playfulness you have great power to mould or deform its conceptions: you who live near it will either help or hinder it in its development. It may be a great author when it grows to maturity, a statesman, a poet, a musician of consummate power, a king of men, a queen of women: be not anxious on this score, since Jesus has revealed a higher destiny. It will be infinitely more than is implied by any such career. It will be a child of God. The little child whose birth we celebrate this Christmas time has set forth in his own life what humanity is to be in the fulness of time—having himself grown into the measure of the stature of a perfect man, he thus shows what your child and every child shall be when it fulfils the divine purpose. It may not attain that end here in this life, but some time in God's eternity it will attain and will be like Christ. No grander destiny is conceivable. Trouble not about the lower attainments when this is assured to those who humbly seek.

How will you help this immortal soul to realise its immortality and live with God? A few years are yours in which to help it or hold it back. Will you guide it to the true light ready to guide every man coming into the world; guide it to the source of good and truth to which you look yourself, so that it may no longer depend on your guidance, but may live with God? Or will you give it false directions which lead it to empty voids and troubled thoughts and breaking of the heart? You may make it dependent on many comforts of body and much luxury of surrounding, you may separate it from the poor and the needy by a golden chain, train it in habits of selfishness through your selfish affection, seek for it visible superiority to the common lot of men, a relative success, and even sacrifice your own personal well-being to its amusements, falsify your own ideals of good that you may minister to its pleasures, and in so doing you shall shroud both lives in gloom ere many years. The Holy Child bids us live the simple life seeking no gain through others' loss. The attainment he sets before us excludes no one, invites us to the needy, the poor, and the ignorant: he breaks down barriers, uplifts all to the same high level. Luxury and embroidery are impossible to any conception of the manger-cradle, and devotion to exclusive refinements can find no place in the Christ life.

What will you teach your child? The way of Christ, or the way of Mammon? Real goodness and the desire to share it with all, or the seeking of distinction and separation from the crowd? Peace and joy in the holy spirit, or war and hatred and jealousy? Life leading to fuller life, or death from which must come painful resurrection? Choose life, that thou and thy seed may live,—the life that was in Christ. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

"THE HOLY CHILD JESUS."

HOLINESS is not a trait we often connect with childhood. We think of it as belonging to maturity. We associate it with effort, repression, austerity. And these are repugnant to our thought of childhood. Our ideal child—the child who is just what a child should be—is fresh, unconstrained, spontaneous, open-minded, ingenuous, receptive, free. He is not studying himself, he is not repressing himself continually, because his instincts are right instincts, and his impulses good impulses. Well, that is true childish holiness: the rightness of a nature born to love what is good; that takes to it as its natural element; that is candid, truthful, docile, brave and affectionate. And childish *un*holiness—is it not the miserable reverse?—to be born greedy, selfish, perverse, with likings for things base and harmful, with diseased appetites, and vicious propensities? Not in either case is it the deliberate choice of the child. It is the happy or the miserable prompting of a well or ill-balanced nature—a nature bent, acted on without forethought or afterthought in either case.

Now, what makes the charm of the child's holiness is this: that it comes without struggle, as the wild rose blossoms and the thrush sings; that it is a part of nature, not won by painful efforts, and restrictions, and bitter experiences. These efforts, and restrictions, and experiences—ah! we know too well that they are the best most of us, inheriting as we do such mixed natures, can attain to. Yes, to strive and struggle and reach with difficulty is the utmost most of us can hope for, and it has its own reward. But to inherit by birthright all this fruit of labour and of pains, to be at home from the first in what is good and pure, not to know the backward drawings of lower things, to breath in what is gentle and loving and generous, and high-minded as one's native air—that is, indeed, the choicest inheritance of a human spirit. And when a child is born so—so captivating, so charming is the freshness and naturalness of its virtue that we hardly recognise it as the same thing we know in its pinched and dwarfed form in our own life.

The holy child is not, then, the prematurely aged child, the self-conscious child—not the one who anticipates the experience of manhood. He is simple, free, open-hearted, glad, hopeful, innocent, trustful, loving. His instinct is to be good and to believe in goodness—to be generous, to be true, to be gentle. There is nothing laboured or artificial about him, nothing of that attempt to wind oneself up to an unnatural level, nothing to repel or estrange us.

Are there such children? Yes, now and then. I think Jesus was such a child. I don't think the man Jesus could have grown out of a greedy, domineering, ill-natured child, who cheated his playmates at games, or was afraid to tell the truth, or who was always looking out for the biggest piece of anything nice, or who hated to learn. We know hardly anything about Jesus's childhood; and this is quite natural, because its little incidents and events were just such as happened in many another house in Nazareth. But the little fragment or two we have fit in with this idea of him. He simply grew up, stronger and wiser daily; glad, fearless, unsuspicious, delighting every one who knew him. What more could we want to know of him? What more would we want any child to be?

But, even if there were no such children, we should still do well to imagine them. One such, pictured in a charming book, is well known. A little boy born into common and meagre surroundings—in a shabby New York street—but born also into the inestimable inheritance of a wholesome and beautiful nature, both outward and inward: a brave, truthful, tender, sweet disposition, a quick and docile mind. He made friends with every one; He admired without envy; He sympathised without hurting any one; he was glad, and frank, and pure-hearted. By and by a strange alteration came in his fortunes; he was turned into the heir to a great earldom; he was transplanted into an English castle, and into a kind of life he never dreamed of. His daily companion was a selfish and morose old grandfather, who had never really loved any one, or tried to do a kind act in his life. But because this little fellow was so affectionate and generous himself, because he always expected to find kindness and goodness in others, because he was innocent and loyal himself, his new surroundings did him no harm; he won the love of every one who met him. He ended by thawing and softening even the self-willed and hard-hearted old earl himself, and in really bringing out of him some of the goodness the little boy believed in. It is a fancy picture, but how potent to touch and win our distracted hearts; how true in its picture of the divine power of an unstudied, warm, fresh, childish goodness. What child would not like to be such a holy child? What father or mother would not like their children to be such?

That, truly, is what we should long and hope for. All the conditions, it is true, are not in our control. We cannot ensure just what powers and dispositions our children shall inherit; but we may all do something to surround them with an atmosphere of peace and love—an atmosphere of simplicity, of mutual trust, of the expectation of good from each other. Oh, how powerful that genial air of expectancy is to woo and win out of the soil of a child's nature the hidden seeds of good. It is like the May sunshine to the earth. Not to be suspicious yourself; not to censure harshly; not to dwell on the faults of others; to be uniformly gentle and considerate yourself; to withhold the knowledge of evil; not to confuse the child's sense of right and wrong by putting mere etiquette and decorum on the same level; to bring beautiful examples in your child's way; to treat trust, and fidelity, and courage, and kindness as matters of course; to let it feel them as the habit of its home: in these ways, and such as these, we may every one of us help our children to find goodness natural and congenial to them. This delicate and exquisite human instrument is meant to be in tune; it ought not to vibrate to all the discords, and only now and then hit on the right key. Nor ought we to spend our life in merely getting it in tune. We want it to be in tune from the first, ready to take its part in the divine harmony of life.

Jesus, I trust, will not always be the exception. No; he is the type, the hope, the precedent for all. One day, if our human development continues, if our progress be deep and true, all our children shall be holy children, born to goodness; joyous, beautiful, and at home in it.

"GIFTS UNTO MEN!"

CHRISTMAS mid arctic ice: Christmas 'neath tropic sun.
Christmas on rain-clad hills: Christmas in deserts dry:
Christmas where buds are green; where Spring has scarce begun:
Christmas where Autumn sheaves in golden glory lie:
Around the rolling world, in every tongue and clime,
Glad Christmas carols ring; glad bells exultant chime.

Love for the frozen heart: rest for the burning brain:
Hope in the mist of tears: shade in the desert strife:
Light for the budding soul, untouched of sin and pain:
Songs for the Harvest-home in the even-tide of life:
Christ hath a gift for all! Ring out in holy mirth,
"Glory to God on high! Peace and good-will on earth!" H. W. HAWKES.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—A member of the congregation has presented to the Rev. J. J. Wright the latest edition, in half-morocco, of "The Encyclopædia Britannica." By certain alterations and extensions, a commodious and well fitted-up cellar-kitchen, with a large and well-lighted class-room above it, for Sunday and day school purposes, have just been completed. These were opened on Monday last, when the eightieth birthday of Mrs. Hodson, an old member of the chapel, and a former teacher in the Sunday-school, was suitably celebrated. In addition to his offer of a fine organ for the chapel, and the many other generous helps which he and his family have rendered in various ways, Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., has now offered to build a vestibule and organ chamber. This is to be in exact keeping with the chapel in style, and will cost £700.

Bootle.—Rather more than a month ago the Rev. J. Morley Mills gave a lecture in the Free Church, entitled "From Paganism to Christianity," tracing the history from the earliest times to the coming of Augustine to this country. On Sunday week he gave a further lecture, continuing the story from that point to the time of Wiclif. The Bootle Times devotes a column and a half to a good report of the lecture. At a recent meeting of the Literary Society, held on Monday evening, the Rev. H. D. Roberts gave his lecture, "Four hundred miles on foot among the Maories and hot lakes of New Zealand," illustrated by lantern views.

Chatham.—On Wednesday week a conversazione was given by the Sunday-school teachers when a large number of friends assembled, and the entertainment was of a varied and excellent character.

Chichester.—On Sunday last the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott resumed his pulpit duties after an absence of over three weeks through an acute attack of influenza. During the interval the services were ably conducted by Mr. Councillor Morris Bew (solicitor).

Deal.—Our mid-week meetings were closed for the year on Tuesday, when a successful gathering was held, and the children sang hymns by denominational writers (including the Christmas hymn, "It came upon the midnight clear"), and some of the members gave suitable readings or recitations.

Derby.—The biennial Bazaar and Sale of Work, in aid of the funds of Friargate Chapel, was opened on Thursday, Dec. 13, by the Hon. F. Strutt, J.P.; Mr. Franklin Winser, J.P., of Nottingham, President of the North Midland Association, in the chair. The Rev. J. Birks explained that they needed £150, and hoped to raise £200, so as to enter on the New Century with a good balance, for the support of their work. The chairman having referred to the work of his Association, and the principles of Unitarianism, in which he was a strong believer, spoke of the early connection of Dr. Martineau with Friargate Chapel, and the family associations of the Hon. F. Strutt with the congregation. Mr. Strutt, in declaring the bazaar opened, said he was always glad to help their work. His grandfather and great-uncle had worshipped there during the ministry of Mr. Higginson, and had also been educated in his school. On the motion of Mr. S. D. Hall, seconded by Councillor Wilkins, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Strutt and the chairman. The sale was continued on Friday and Saturday, and the total receipts amounted to £160.

Dewsbury (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Unity Church.

Dromore (co. Down).—A very enjoyable concert was given in the schoolroom on Thursday evening, 13th inst. The audience was large and appreciative, the performers capable and popular, so that a most agreeable evening was spent. Since the appointment of the Rev. A. Davison, the attendance at morning and evening service has been most encouraging, and he has already won the confidence of the congregation.

Dunmurry (co. Antrim).—On Thursday evening, 13th inst., Mr. John M'Clelland Martin, of Belfast, very kindly gave a lantern lecture on "Paris and the Exhibition," on behalf of the funds of the Sunday-school, the Rev. J. A. Kelly in the chair. The views were of great excellence, and the lecture was much enjoyed. After hearty votes of thanks to lecturer and lanternist (Mr. A. R. Hogg, of Belfast), the meeting closed with the "National Anthem." Mr. Kelly's memorial of the late Mr. H. J. M'Cance, referred to in our last issue, may be had for 6d. and postage, from the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, 35, Rosemary-street, Belfast.

Guildford.—The Young People's Sale of Work took place on Dec. 14, and was opened by Mrs. Edwin Ellis. The stalls were prettily arranged, so that the Ward-street Hall looked quite picturesque. Many friends from a distance were present. The Rev. Hubert Clark, of Meadrow, Godalming, expressed the good wishes of the visitors. At the opening of the sale a vote of thanks was passed to Mrs. Edwin Ellis for her unfailing sympathy with the aims and aspirations of the church, and at the conclusion a similar mark of gratitude was paid to Mrs. Newenham, to whom the success of the sale is almost entirely due. A capital musical programme was arranged.

Halstead (Essex).—Mr. W. H. Shrubsole's sermon on Sunday week was on "The Origin and Growth of the Idea of God," showing how, with the growth of moral ideas through countless ages, the conception of God had also been exalted, so that now fuller and nobler thoughts of Him were possible than ever before. Some careful notes of the sermon appeared in the Halstead and Colne Valley Gazette.

Heaton Moor.—The new school-chapel in King's Drive was opened on Saturday, Dec. 8, and is to be known as the Heaton Moor Free Church. The congregation has hitherto met in the Reform Hall. The new building has cost £2,060, towards which the District Association granted £1,100, and there is ground for the subsequent erection of a church. The opening service was conducted by the Rev. Priestley Prime, and the sermon preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. After tea at the Reform Hall, a public meeting was held. The chair was taken by Mr. Edward Ashworth, who declared the basis of their union to be worship of the Father in spirit and in truth. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson gave an address, in which he dwelt on the forward movement of religious thought and life in the century. He thanked God that the old sectarian spirit was dying out. There was nothing at which they ought to rejoice more in the century now dying than in the growth of this brotherly spirit. Referring to the changes of religious thought and belief, he said that they, as Unitarians, taught the presence in the world of the Living God. They were not afraid of science, or of truth. The principle in their minds was that truth was God speaking in humanity. They did not fear that discoveries could upset this foundation of their faith. Discoveries only revealed truth more brightly than before. He thanked God that he was the minister of a church that had always given him that liberty which was the handmaid of truth. He would not exchange the glorious freedom that he enjoyed as a minister of that little church for a high creed-bound position in the Church under the authority of the State. Taking the national spirit of to-day, he was not prepared to say that they were in the midst of a forward movement. He had never felt sadder at heart than he did now as a citizen of this great country. People sometimes talked in a scoffing spirit of the Nonconformist conscience. He believed it might be the salvation of the country if they had the courage of their faith and opinions. Nations were subject to the laws of God as much as men. He hoped the new church would be an influence on behalf of righteousness, justice, liberty, and goodwill between man and man. Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood addressed the meeting as a representative of the Manchester District Association. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal and the Rev. Priestley Prime having spoken, the Rev. P. K. Batchan, Congregational minister at Heaton Moor, speaking of the interior of the school church, said he considered it ideal for its size. He congratulated the congregation on their minister, and he congratulated himself on being present at their opening meeting, where he felt the influence of freedom around him. He commented upon the various uses in England and Scotland of the designation "Free Church," a term which, he said, assumes a superiority to the Church from which its members emerged. No Church, however free, is free from bias. But, added Mr. Batchan, you and I are free to respect each other. In the fellowship of Christianity we worship the same Father. The Rev. T. F. Kinloch, Presbyterian, humorously remarked that he sometimes heard strange and erroneous definitions of Presbyterianism, but even stranger ones of Unitarianism. He congratulated them upon the attractive appearance of the church, and wished them success. Mr. Frank Harland, speaking as one who had been actively associated with the congregation, sketched the origin and progress of its formation. After a short speech by the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, Mr. Hans Renold made a financial statement, and votes of thanks brought the meeting to a close.

Hull.—On Wednesday, Dec. 12, at a meeting of the Workers' League, Mr. W. Graham in the chair, Mr. W. Davison opened a discussion on "Should the British Empire be extended?" advocating concentration of resources and progress within present limits. Last Sunday the morning service was conducted by the Rev. H. Rawlings; in the evening the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed preached on "Lethe and Eunoe."

Leigh (Lancashire).—A Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom on Saturday last, opened by Mrs. J. W. Barlow, of Atherton. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin presided, and was supported by Mr. C. P. Scott, M.P., Revs. Dr. Karfoot (Congregationalist), and J. J. Wright; Mr. M. S. Burrows, J.P. (Baptist), and others. The sum of £51 was realised in aid of church expenses and decoration fund.

London: George's-row Domestic Mission.—Mr. Summers gratefully acknowledges 10s. from "H. E.," and a few articles from unknown friends.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—On Sunday evening last the monthly popular service was held. These services are devoted to the consideration of questions of general public interest, and the pulpit is usually occupied by the representative of some nationality or race other than our own, or by the known representative of some public movement. Last Sunday the speaker was Mr. J. F. Green, Secretary of the International Arbitration Association and Secretary of the Society of Friends of Russian Freedom. His subject was "The Struggle for Freedom in Russia," upon which he delivered an eloquent and stirring appeal. After service the Social Hour was held in the schoolroom. One night each month the congregation adjourns to the schoolroom after evening service, where tea and coffee are served, and a quiet hour passed with music and conversation. Last Sunday, in addition to Mr. Green, we had two distinguished visitors in the persons of Mr. Williams, Secretary of the African Association, and the Rev. Mr. Smith, both of them gentlemen of colour, and both cultured representatives of their race. Mr. Williams, who had spoken at a previous popular service, gave a short address, and Mr. Smith sang some melodies. It is an innovation to have any speaking at the Social Hour, but we were all glad to hear Mr. Williams, and to cheer him in his great task of guiding and guarding his much oppressed race.

Pepperhill, near Halifax.—On Sunday last the services at this isolated Unitarian outpost were conducted by Mr. W. F. Clay and Mr. Fred Clayton, both of Leeds, the former in the afternoon, and the latter in the evening. Despite the boisterous weather, there were good congregations, and a very hearty welcome was given to Mr. Clay, whose connection with Pepperhill as a lay-preacher extends about twenty-six years, but whom illness compelled to relinquish this work about seven years ago. The congregation is entirely composed of working people, many of them residing long distances from the chapel. Too much cannot be said in praise of the manner in which they carry on the work, and they are worthy of all encouragement in the energy they display in maintaining and endeavouring to spread a liberal and practical religion. The services were bright and hearty, the discourses appropriate to the occasion, and altogether the gathering was very helpful.

Portsmouth: High-street.—Mr. G. Cosens Prior is delivering a course of lectures, which began on Nov. 25, on "The Close of the Nineteenth Century and a Century's Development of Religious Thought." The lectures have been attended by unusually large congregations, and have attracted much interested attention. On New Year's Eve a special service will be held with memorial reference to Christ's life and death.

Richmond.—The ladies of the Richmond Free Church held a quiet Sale of Work at The Knoll, on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 13. The bad weather did not prevent a good attendance; a good sale of really good work, and a good financial result; something over £60 was realised. The ladies who have wrought for this sale desire to express their thanks to the many friends who have helped them to make it a success.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A pleasant social evening was spent in Channing Hall on Thursday, Dec. 13, by the teachers and elder scholars of the Sunday-school, when a presentation was made to Mr. E. E. Chitty, who has been a most indefatigable worker in the school and its allied institutions during his four years' stay in Sheffield, which, to universal regret, has now come to a close, owing to his departure to London. The present consisted of a gold watch chain, an engraved silver matchbox, and a choice selection of books. The presentation was made by Mrs. Manning, and the Rev. J. E. Manning, Mr. Wm. Laycock, Mr. Moody, and Mr. Dungworth also spoke, all bearing warm testimony to the value of Mr. Chitty's work. In acknowledging the gifts, Mr. Chitty appealed to all present to loyally support their school. During the evening an entertaining programme was carried out, and after supper the evening wound up with a dance.

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH and MISSION.

URGENT APPEAL.

The Trustees of the Fund raised at the BAZAAR have offered £500 towards enabling the Mansford-street Committee to buy the heavy ground rent which now has to be paid out of Income. To do this another £1,000 at least will have to be raised, and towards this £800 has been promised by friends and supporters.

The Committee now feel they may make a more general appeal for the £200 which is still required, especially as Mansford-street is a continuation of the old Spicer-street Mission (the first Domestic Mission started in London), and so long under the care of Mr. Corkran.

Many of those now belonging to the Missions were connected with Spicer-street, or are the children of those who were so.

The Committee think they have a very strong case for asking the support of all those who believe in Missionary work, and earnestly solicit a speedy and liberal response.

Subscriptions and promises will be thankfully received by Miss L. JONES,
Riverton, Hadley Wood, Barnet (Treas.),
or S. W. PRESTON,
7, Eldon-road, Hampstead (Hon. Sec.).

IN WHOM WE LIVE AND MOVE AND HAVE OUR BEING.

O THOU who art of all that is Beginning both and end,
We follow thee through unknown paths,
Since all to thee must tend:
Thy judgments are a mighty deep
Beyond all fathom-line;
Our wisdom is the childlike heart,
Our strength, to trust in thine.

We bless thee for the skies above,
And for the earth beneath,
For hopes that blossom here below
And wither not with death;
But most we bless thee for thyself,
O heavenly Light within,
Whose dayspring in our hearts dispels
The darkness of our sin.

Be thou in joy our deeper joy,
Our comfort when distressed;
Be thou by day our strength for toil,
And thou by night our rest.
And when these earthly dwellings fail,
And time's last hour is come,
Be thou, O God, our dwelling place,
And our eternal home.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FAREWELL to the Old Century and welcome to the New! In what spirit we must pass into the new time, we have attempted in another column to say; here we would only repeat our good wishes of last week to all friends, near and distant, and thanks, which no words can sufficiently express, for abundant help and sympathy in the work which THE INQUIRER is set to do. Messages come to us from time to time telling how some word in THE INQUIRER has gone home, and brought help and encouragement and sympathy where there was great need. To many friends who help to make our paper what it is, we would here pass on such acknowledgments of gratitude, and express the hope that all beautiful and sacred memories of the past may go with us, as a constant source of strength and inspiration, to make the New Year happy indeed and rich in the accomplishment of better service.

WE would once more call the attention of our readers to the Supplement which is again enclosed with the present number. It states in a few words the purpose with which THE INQUIRER will enter on the new century, and we shall be thankful for all friendly help in extending the usefulness of our paper by a wider distribution, both among the members of the congregations to whose interest THE INQUIRER is specially devoted, and among other readers to whom its attitude towards religion may be congenial and helpful. In the early days, when THE INQUIRER cost fivepence, a single copy saw much service, and was often generously sent from house to house by a loyal supporter; but now that the paper costs only a penny, what was formerly a virtue would appear in a different light, and the more helpful way is to multiply the number of copies that are sent out.

PARTICULARS of special services to be held on New Year's Eve, at Stoke Newington and at Highgate, will be found advertised in another column.

AT the close of the century we should be glad once more to refer to the new "Book of Daily Strength," which was among Mr. Philip Green's publications earlier in the year, and was noticed at the time of its appearance in these columns. The editor of the book happens to be also editor of THE INQUIRER, and therefore has some hesitation in calling attention to his own work; but it was undertaken not on his own motion—he has no private interest in the result—and, after all, it is not his own work, but the words of others gathered up into the book, which he is anxious to commend for wide acceptance, for the sake of that helpfulness in the higher life which they abundantly minister. The writers from whom selection is made for the daily readings belong, all of them, to the two kindred communities in England and America known as Unitarian, and the special purpose of the selection is thus stated in the Preface :—

At the end of a century of religious life it seemed not inappropriate to gather up some such humble memorial as this, recalling the words of revered and beloved teachers, which would speak with peculiar force within the household itself, and might at the same time bear a useful testimony in other quarters to the significance of their religious life.

Of English writers there are fifty-four, of American thirty-four, while two, Robert Collyer and William Mountford, are starred in the index of authors as American, but they are English also. There are thus ninety voices speaking in the book. May they speak from these pages in many homes!

WRITING in this week's Christian World on "The New Century's Religion," "J. B." looks forward with a good hope. While the century is to be great in Science and in Commerce, he is convinced that it will also be a great religious and Christian century :—

There have been, and will be, far-reaching changes in the form of Christian doctrine, changes such as would take away the breath of theologians living when the present century began. But we are coming to see that the greatest of them affect the outward only and leave the essence untouched. What man chooses to build, whether on theological or on other sites, his brother man can take down. We know now a little better how to estimate this building process. We know, too, that, as Hegel puts it, "the Divine idea assumes successive forms, which successively change and pass."

When the falling rubbish has been cleared away and the dust attending the operation has settled, we look round to discover what is left, and find that everything is left that is of value to the soul. What we see in the new light that fills our eyes enables us to make some fresh affirmations. And the most certain of them is that the new century, so far from breaking with religion, will lean more and more heavily upon it. It is the soul's atmosphere, more essential to it than is the air it breathes to the body. We have only to define it truly, as the discipline of the human spirit on its loftiest side, as the opening of the soul to the infinitudes to which it belongs, to realise how, more than aught else we can name, religion belongs to our inmost being.

Speaking particularly of the Protestant position, he adds :—

With no irrevocable commitment to exploded theologic propositions, it is free to experiment on the new century with all the magnificent spiritual dynamic of the primitive Gospel. It is a happy augury of the time that the Free Churches of this country are to begin the coming year with a united aggressive movement. They look into their armoury for the conflict, and they discover that criticism has taken away from it no single weapon. The saving Gospel in all the elements of an Infinite redeeming Love, of a living Christ the Friend of sinners, of a Divine Spirit who regenerates and converts the soul, of the peace that follows believing, and the immeasurable joys and sanctities of the devout life, all this is theirs to proclaim; and proclaim it they will with the ardour of men whose inmost feeling goes with every word. That is hardly a decadent system which has this for its immediate programme.

MR. STEAD'S "Character Sketch" in the December Review of Reviews deals not with any one person, but with "The Nineteenth Century." It touches, in conclusion, on the religion of the century, which it describes as "Christ-centred," the vital religious movement of the century having been "the dawning consciousness of the reality of the Christian soul of mankind," and looking forward to the new century, the sketch concludes :—

The hope that we may be on the eve of the discovery of a wider synthesis which will unveil to the wistful eye of man a real Catholicism, and display the essential unity which pervades all the religions of all the world, is in itself a prophecy of what may be in store for us. "God wills, man hopes," said the poet, and the mere aspiration after the advent of such a thing may be one of the agencies helping to bring it about. The remarkable gathering known as the Parliament of Religions, that met at Chicago seven years ago, foreshadowed the realisation of such an ideal. In the coming centuries it may be that the Parliament of Religions will loom more largely than the Œcumenical Council which decreed the infallibility of the Pope. The unity of mankind once recognised as the necessary correlative of the unity of God, and much at present chimerical becomes attainable. "One is your father, and all ye are brethren," is the first article of the religion of the future. From that, all the rest may be deduced. . . . . "Be a Christ!" In these three words are summed up the vital essence of the Christian creed, and who knows but that in the twentieth century it may be possible to advance some steps nearer to the realisation of that ideal Church—the Union of all who Love in the Service of all who suffer?

IN the December number of The Coming Day the Rev. J. Page Hopps gives a forecast of what he proposes for the New Year :—

We should like old friends and new to go on with us. For next year, we promise three studies of Mr. Herbert Spencer's First Principles, Part I. on "The Unknowable"; a Lecture on "A Rational and Practical View of a Future Life," and a new course of "Sermons for Our Day," including the following subjects :—"The Higher Evolution," "The Mystery of Sin," "The All-seeing God," "Individualism the Brotherhood," "How to seek first the Kingdom of God," "Gifts to God," "A Summons to the Young."

Mr. Hopps also includes in this number an address on "This Wonderful Nineteenth Century ; or Some of the Disadvantages and Dangers of Modern Civilisation," in which he speaks of the enormous increase of wealth and the false standard of social worth to which it gives rise, the sensationalism of the Press, the excess of amusements, and other subjects, and yet concludes that after all it has been a grand century, prophetic of something much better, since even out of our evil the Great Power who is educating the human race is still educing good. "But I am no pessimist," he says; "I am only one who dislikes to live in a fool's paradise. If an unflattering outlook upon the age takes the nonsense out of us so much the better for us. But I have not been only a prophet of evil. Even in the blackest spots I have tried to see foregleams of some compensating good, the indications of something even hopeful and beautiful. But if what I have said is true, we sorely need something besides machinery and money, we need literature and philosophy, poetry, ideality, and delight in things that cannot be weighed or measured or put to your account at the bank. That way may our salvation be."

A CORRESPONDENT, Mr. J. Nield, to whom we have been more than once indebted for interesting contributions to these columns, referring to the late Dr. Momerie, whose death was recently announced, asks as one who has derived no small help from his books, to be allowed to say a word or two about the man and his teaching:—"A scholar of brilliant parts (witness his success at Edinburgh and Cambridge), Dr. Momerie was undoubtedly possessed of a deeply religious nature, and used his rare dialectical skill on behalf of that larger spiritual faith which thoughtful men in all Churches are looking to. Rightly or wrongly, he refused to be driven out of the Established Church, and he endeavoured to show how, since the alteration in the terms of subscription effected through Dean Stanley's efforts, the position of a Liberal clergyman in the Church was perfectly justified. He strenuously urged that in essence the Church was inclusive—not exclusive, and the only qualification for membership which he appeared to insist upon was that of righteousness. True, he had to own (especially in later years) that such a comprehensive basis was at present very far from being realised, and that, unless a change in actual Church conditions were effected, the teaching of true religion would pass into other channels.

"It will be known to readers of THE INQUIRER how he suffered for his open advocacy of these large principles ; unfortunately there can be little doubt that, even amongst Religious Liberals, a certain amount of sympathy was withheld because of a feeling that the ex-Professor lacked somewhat that suaviter in modo which we like to associate with religious teachers. I cannot help thinking that, in this, considerable injustice was done Dr. Momerie. There was, perhaps, a certain 'assertiveness' about the man, as he appeared in the pulpit, that would repel some; but I believe that, if anyone will carefully study his volumes, they will find enough to convince them that, besides courage and candour, Dr. Momerie was possessed of an earnest kindly spirit."

TIME THE TUTOR.

AWAKE from dreams that life is ease,
And gird your manhood's armour on!
Seek not the passing hour to please
With its own self, like Folly's son—
But let your path to Heav'n be formed
Of one continuous sequent way,
Wherein to-day's position stormed,
Shall be the morrow's strength and stay.

Though oft thrust from the onward track,
Unbeaten still resume again,
Like hunting hound that harks not back,
But when its guidance falters vain :
Who furthest comes, he conquers most;
Who best can bear, he strongest is!
Time's children dwell with failure's ghost,
Men move to greater energies.

E. B. B.

ALL of this world will soon have passed away. But God will remain and thou, whatever thou hast become, good or bad. Thy deeds now are the seed-corn of eternity. Each single act, in each several day, good or bad, is a portion of that seed. Each day adds some line, making thee more or less like Him, more or less capable of His love.—E. B. Pusey.

BROKEN SHELLS.

Gathered on the Shores of Thought.

We are but children in the school of life,
And, when the day is done, with joyful steps
We cross the shining fields that lie between,
Enter our Father's gate and are at home.

. . . . .

SEE that patriarchal Oak! He stands like a High Priest with his crowned head and his outstretched arms, from which blessings fall upon the fields and flocks around. Is he not a High Priest? The records of centuries are garnered in his heart. He has much to tell and much to teach. Millions of creatures have been fed and sheltered by his bounty. His stirring eloquence touches the soul and leads it heavenward. Can any priest do more?

. . . . .

In all Christian services the Praise of God is an important item. A thoughtful soul cannot fail to ask "Does God care to be praised? Does not the word express a pagan thought?" When we think of the Infinite Creator, the All-knowing, the All good, whose name is Love, there is a stirring of the emotions, a swelling of the heart which naturally finds voice in words of adoration and thankfulness. Is Praise a proper name for such expression?

. . . . .

In Nature's moving panorama pictures of special beauty come often into view, and with the next turn of time they vanish and are lost to us for ever. It is the joy of Art to catch these fleeting visions, and to crystallise their beauty into permanent form and colour, for the delight of eyes to which otherwise they could never have been revealed. What a treasure-house of beauty is thus accumulated as the centuries roll on!

. . . . .

How slowly does the developing soul realise the difference between the Finite and the Infinite. How hard is it to understand that God is the only Creator, and that the whole finite universe, including men and angels, is no more able to initiate a thought than to create a worm.

. . . . .

When the trees put on their autumn robes of gold and bronze and crimson we say the leaves are dying. But when the flowers open their many-coloured petals we say it is the glory of the year, the crown of summer, the very climacteric of floral life. Are not the autumn colours the flowering of the leaf-buds, as the opening petals are the flowering of the fruit-buds? Beauty of form and colour seems to be the real end and aim of evolution. Its appearance marks always the climax of some life-wave. The mere perpetuation of the race is not the ultimate object of either leaf or flower, it is but a means for the production of more beauty.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1900.

AT the close of the present year, which marks also the end of a century, our thoughts are naturally occupied with the wider outlook; and, indeed, if we would gather hope and confidence for the future, we have need to look beyond this year which marks the close of a great era of human history, but is darkened by the misery and the foreboding caused by the heart-breaking conflict in South Africa. We shall say little in these notes of the war which has overshadowed the whole year, causing a depression by no means lightened by the tone of popular demonstrations over victories and on the return of troops, nor by the treatment meted out to those who dared to advocate an unpopular cause. A British and Colonial army of 200,000 men has succeeded in breaking the power of the two republics, but at a cost immeasurably greater than the millions spent and to be spent in the support of our arms; and whether the result will be ultimate peace and prosperity for that distracted country, or hopeless failure of the Imperial power in South Africa, it is impossible as yet to say.

The Government in the autumn appealed to the country, for reasons known to themselves, and received again an overwhelming majority. For the present they have simply secured further supplies; how they will meet the tremendous responsibilities resting on their shoulders remains for the future to show.

The outbreak of the "Boxers" in China, and the united European expedition for the relief of the Legations in Peking, has been another painful episode of the year; and while the worst horror of a wholesale massacre of the European colony was averted, there has been horrible cruelty and slaughter, which unhappily cannot all be charged to Chinese barbarity. The gravest issues in the Far East are still in suspense.

The third great tragedy of the year has been the Indian Famine, wider in its extent and more dreadful in its sufferings than any famine of recent times. Vigorous efforts were made by the Indian Government, and substantial help was sent from this country, to mitigate the worst horrors of the disaster; but it has been strongly urged that more radical measures are practicable, and must be adopted, to furnish the people with better means of facing the recurrent failure of harvests. One gratifying mark of sympathy with the sufferers was the special fund of £2,558 raised by members of our own religious community, and entrusted to the members of the Brahmo Somaj to be administered in the famine districts. The token of sympathy was deeply appreciated, and gave to our Indian brethren an opportunity of devoted personal service which they thankfully embraced.

Much has been said during the year of the strengthening of the bonds of unity throughout the Empire caused by the war. A happier achievement of peace was the passing of the Australian Commonwealth Bill, securing the federation of those great colonies, which is to be inaugurated with the new year.

Of home affairs there seems little of much significance to record. In the metropolis the new Borough Councils have been elected, but have still to work out their great possibilities of good for the welfare of the people. At the School Board election the Progressive party only just retained their majority. The transformed University of London has established its headquarters in Kensington. Whether Parliament will find time to do anything substantial for national education, or will do only mischief, also remains for the future to decide.

ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

Excitement over the ritual controversies in the Church has not been so acute as it was last year, but the Archbishops gave a decided pronouncement against the legality of Reservation of the Sacrament. The retirement of the venerable Bishop of Liverpool was followed shortly after by his death. His son, Professor Ryle, of Cambridge, was later in the year appointed Bishop of Exeter. The Rev. F. J. Chavasse, Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, succeeded to the Bishopric of Liverpool. That city, and Wesleyans and Temperance workers throughout the country, had also to mourn the loss of Charles Garrett. The most significant ecclesiastical event of the year was doubtless the union, accomplished on the last day of October of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church, now the United Free Church of Scotland. The jubilee of the New College, at Edinburgh, was celebrated at the same time, and a new hall, called after the Principal, and the first Moderator of the United Free Church, Rainy Hall, was opened. Another New College, at St. John's Wood, belonging to the Congregational body, celebrated its jubilee about the same time. The Evangelical Free Churches have been largely occupied during the year in the raising of Twentieth Century Funds, and preparing for a great simultaneous mission with which to inaugurate the new century. One of their organs, The Puritan, a monthly illustrated magazine, seems to have come to an end. In the summer a great "World's Convention" of the Christian Endeavour Society was held in London. Significant in another direction was the International Congress for the History of Religions, held at Paris in September, in connection with the Exhibition.

OUR FREE CHURCHES.

For our own churches it has been a year of much interest, and of one event which stands alone in the depth of feeling it evoked and its profound significance in our religious life. The early days of January brought the close of that long life, which for the greater part of the century had been devoted to the service of truth and spiritual religion as it is cherished in our Free Churches, the life which of all others had most powerfully influenced their life, and, indeed, the progress of religious truth in the whole country. Death cannot remove that inspiring influence, and while throughout the religious world the name of James Martineau is held in honour, he remains with us, the great teacher of these latter days, the enlightener and helper of our deeper life, revered and beloved, with his incomparable gifts yet one of us, the friend who has most clearly shown us the ideal of service to which we are called.

The National Conference, which met in April at Leicester, brought to us some valuable papers, and much stimulating discussion, both in public and private, in the great gathering of our people, but what we remember most vividly is Mr. Stopford Brooke's noble tribute to Dr. Martineau.

A few weeks later came the great meetings in Boston, to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association, attended by the Revs. Charles Hargrove and W. Copeland Bowie, as representing the B. and F.U.A., and Mr. and Miss Pritchard, representing the Sunday School Association. Then, also, was formed the "International Council of Unitarians and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers," which is to hold a second meeting in London next year. These Boston meetings brought us welcome visitors in passing—Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, who went to represent the Brahmo Somaj of India, the Rev. George Boros, who represented the Unitarian Churches of Hungary and returned a Doctor of Divinity, and the Rev. Clay MacCauley, who returned home in time for the anniversary meetings, after ten years of service in Japan, leaving the Unitarian mission in that country in the hands of native workers.

During the year the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams has continued his much-appreciated work as representative of English Unitarians in India, finding a warm response to his services from the members of the Brahmo Somaj. In addition to his lecturing and preaching in Calcutta, he spent some time at Darjeeling, and later in the year paid a visit to some of the chief cities in the North-Western Provinces.

The Jubilee of the London District Unitarian Society has been signalised by the great success of the Bazaar held at the beginning of May, raising by its means and by direct donations a sum of £13,344, of which £9,000 is set aside as a Permanent Chapel Building Fund for London, while the remainder is at the disposal of the Society, to meet the needs of existing churches.

The Sunday School Association was represented by a good exhibit at the Education Exhibition at the Imperial Institute early in the year and subsequently at the Paris Exhibition, when a booklet by the Rev. J. J. Wright, descriptive of the history and work of the schools, was distributed. The Association, with the cordial co-operation of the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, Oxford, organised a second most successful Summer School for Teachers at the College. Another notable Sunday-school effort was the opening by the Manchester District Association of its Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, setting on a more permanent basis the work which had already been tried with the happiest results.

The Manchester District Association of Churches in the latter part of the year organised a large number of special lectures and devotional services, and in other districts efforts have been made to mark the coming of a new century.

During the year several new school buildings and churches have been opened:—Birkenhead, new schools and church hall; Bradford, Manchester, new church; Gateshead, Unity Church; Blackpool, Banks-street new schools; Heaton Moor, school-church; while at Leicester the stone has been laid for the new Free Christian Church, at Chorlton-cum-Hardy, for the new church, and at Blackley for new school-buildings. The chapels at Chow-bent, at Newbury, at Ipswich, and Little Portland-street, London, have been re-opened after renovation.

It has been a year of bicentenaries, the congregations at Antrim, Chester, Gateacre, Hindley, Ipswich, and Upper Chapel, Sheffield, having all celebrated the two-hundredth anniversary of their present meeting-houses, the commemoration at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, being combined with a most successful autumnal meeting of the B. and F.U.A. The Sunday-school at Dukinfield celebrated its centenary The opening of Willaston School at Nantwich, the foundation of the late Philip Barker, should also be recorded.

BOOKS.

Among the books of special interest, which have appeared in the course of the year, have been the concluding volumes of the great "Dictionary of National Biography," the late Dr. John Caird's Gifford Lectures on the "Fundamental Ideas of Christianity," Professor Percy Gardner's "Exploratio Evangelica," Dr. R. H. Charles's Jowett Lectures the "History of the Doctrine of the Future Life in Israel," the third volume of Dr. Hasting's "Dictionary of the Bible," a second volume of the "International Handbooks to the New Testament," edited by Dr. Orello Cone, containing the Synoptic Gospels, edited by Professor G. L. Cary, "The Hexateuch," arranged in its constituent documents, with Introduction, &c., by J. Estlin Carpenter and G. Harford Battersby, "Religion and Life, a Plain Essay," by Rollo Russell, the Life of Professor Huxley, Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Eleanor," and a revised and much enlarged edition of Rowntree and Sherwell's "Temperance Problem and Social Reform."

Of valuable chapel histories the year has produced Mr. Manning's "History of Upper Chapel, Sheffield," commemorating the bicentenary, and Mr. Priestley Evan's "History of the New Meeting, Kidderminster."

Among Mr. Philip Green's publications at Essex Hall have been the Rev. Stopford A. Brooks's two lectures on "Religion in Literature and Life"; "Jesus of Nazareth: Lessons of His Life, Death, and Resurrection learnt at Ober-Ammergau," by the Rev. C. Hargrove; and "A Book of Daily Strength," with short readings for every day in the year, selected from English and American Unitarian writers. The Sunday School Association have published another annual volume of "The Helper" and of "Young Days," and a second series of "Half-Hours with the Parables," by the Rev. J. C. Hirst. From America we have received the Rev. J. M. Savage's "Life Beyond Death," the Rev. A. W. Jackson's "James Martineau: A Biography and a Study," the Rev. J. W. Chadwick's "Theodore Parker: Preacher and Reformer," and another delightful little book "On Making Oneself Beautiful," by the Rev. W. C. Gannett.

THE YEAR'S OBITUARY.

Of those whom death has taken from us during the year we have already mentioned the greatest. With James Martineau we remember John Ruskin, as another true prophet of the higher life. The world of thought has also lost Henry Sidgwick and Max Müller, and among Protestant theologians on the Continent Frédéric Godet, of Neuchâtel, and Professor Beyschlag, of Halle. The death of Professor Charles Carroll Everett we feel as a personal loss here, as it is to our brethren across the Atlantic. The death of Mrs. Gladstone vividly recalled the passing of her great husband two years ago. To the Bishop of Liverpool and the Rev. Charles Garrett we have already referred. The assassination of the King of Italy was one of the most painful events of the year. The death of Prince Alfred, Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, brought a personal sorrow to our Queen. The names of the Duke of Argyll, Lord Russell of Killowen (the Lord Chief Justice), Professor St. George Mivart, Munkacsy, the great Hungarian painter, and Sir Arthur Sullivan, the most popular English musician of the Victorian age, must also be added to the roll.

Our obituary columns have contained a long record during the year of losses sustained in our immediate circle. Among the earliest was that of Mrs. Leyson Lewis, Dr. Martineau's eldest daughter, followed so soon by his own departure. Other names widely known are those of Henry J. Cook, of Liverpool, C. F. Stevens, of Norwich, Ald. Ellis, of Maidstone, Miss A. V. Lister, Mrs. Arthur Lupton, Mrs. William Binns, Miss S. E. Squier, Richard Eve, John Every, A. H. Lawrence, J. L. Thornely, and Lord O'Hagan; while from the roll of our ministers we have lost the Revs. D. D. Jeremy, David Thompson, George Hill, H. Hill, John Wright, J. Harrop, J. G. Slater, and Thomas Smyth. These and many other staunch friends and faithful workers have gone over to the majority. They leave with us, who must enter on the new century, many precious memories and a tradition of fidelity and courage and patient continuance in well doing.

God of the living, in whose eyes
Unveiled thy whole creation lies!
All souls are thine: we must not say
That those are dead who pass away:
From earthly toil and strife set free,
They are but living unto thee.

O Breather into man of breath!
O Holder of the keys of death!
O Giver of the life within!
Save us from death, the death of sin;
That body, soul, and spirit be
For ever living unto thee!

A CENTURY OF UNITARIANISM IN ENGLAND.

III.

WORK FOR THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

Unitarians throughout the century have been lovers of truth and freedom. With growing clearness they have come to understand the true significance and the priceless value of that spiritual freedom which is the foundation of their religious life. At the same time they have been lovers of righteousness. With them religion has been with special emphasis a matter of present duty. Finding the truth of the Christian gospel in the humanity of Jesus, they have given themselves to sincere endeavours after the Christian life, in the Master's spirit, learning to pray to the Father who seeth in secret, praying also in strenuous labours for a true brotherhood among men, nourishing hope and trust for the future in fidelity to the divine calls of the present.

Good Citizens.

"Civil and religious liberty all the world over" was a watch-word to which in each generation they responded with fervent zeal and devoted service; and if the cry has now lost something of its kindling power, it may be partly because so much of the battle is already won, but partly also because of a temporary failure of insight and sensitiveness to the present wrong of new oppressions. Certainly, our fathers fought many a good fight, and even among those who most strongly dissented from their religious principles and teaching they were recognised as men of integrity and good citizens. Only brought themselves, as Unitarians, in 1813 within the protection of the law, they were among the staunchest friends of liberty, working always for reform, for greater confidence in the people, for political enfranchisement, for free trade and the abolition of the corn laws, for the abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts, and the disabilities which shut out Roman Catholics and Jews from public life. They have been always the friends of education, maintaining from the earliest years of the century some of the best unsectarian elementary schools, and after the Education Act of 1870 throwing themselves strenuously into School Board work. It was one of their number, the late James Heywood, who in 1854 achieved the victory in Parliament which first opened the old Universities to conscientious Nonconformists. They were among the most unwearied anti-slavery workers, both in the early days of the struggle in this country, and in ardent sympathy and practical co-operation with their kindred in America. In many works of practical charity, in all efforts for good government, for enlightenment and social amelioration, on public boards, in town councils, or in Parliament, Unitarians among their fellow-citizens have recognised in full measure the opportunities for faithful and unselfish service as an essential part of a sincere and healthy religious life.

Ministry to the Poor.

"But," it is said, "Unitarians have no true gospel; they have always attended in an exemplary manner to the affairs of the world, from which the whole community has reaped the benefit; but they have no power to lift up the fallen, or to bring back the desperate sinner from death to life." To which it may be replied that in attending as they have done to the affairs of the world they have been true to the Master's spirit and to his ideal of the Kingdom of God, as covering the whole of life and demanding practical fidelity and self-forgetting service in every part; and as to their power to help the most abandoned, while Unitarians in their religious work have never been able to make use of the excitement of an evangelical revival, it is not true that, touched by the Master's spirit, and going out simply as friends in pure brotherly love, they have no redeeming message to carry, and no power to rescue the perishing and lift them up out of the lowest depths. That our churches have rendered all the service that was open to them in this direction no one will claim, and here we shall find one of the most urgent calls to new life and self-devotion in the coming time; but the way has been shown to us, and what can be accomplished when this simple gospel of human brotherhood, as it possessed the heart of Jesus, takes possession of our lives and compels us to go out to help where the need is greatest.

It was in the year 1826 that Joseph Tuckerman, the life-long friend of Dr. Channing, began his work among the neglected poor of Boston. He went to the most desolate places of that city, which were untouched by the churches and their established agencies, and with unaffected sympathy and brotherly love carried his message of Christian hope and encouragement. He went into desolate homes, and soon found that he must gather the people together in a humble meeting place. So his ministry of practical helpfulness grew, the need and the capacity to meet it were clearly proved, and it came as a spiritual awaking to his friends not only in America but in this country. It was not long before reports of what Tuckerman was doing reached our people, and at a general meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held in Manchester in 1830, the committee was instructed to inquire into the prospect of such work among the poor of our great cities; and at the annual meeting in the following year, largely under the initiative of the Rev. W. J. Fox, it was decided to establish a mission in London. In March, 1832, a weaver's shed in Spicer-street, Spitalfields, was converted into a humble chapel, and the mission, the first of its kind established by our people in this country, was placed under the care of the Rev. J. K. Philp. As the work grew it became clear that it would be better separated from the operations of the Unitarian Association, and in 1835 the mission was transferred to a new society, founded on an unsectarian basis, the London Domestic Mission Society. Meanwhile a similar society had been founded in 1833 in Manchester, and the movement was greatly stimulated by a visit paid to this country towards the close of that year, by Dr. Tuckerman himself. He came with a friend, and of the impression they they made in Liverpool Dr. Martineau tells in his memorial preface to the last volume of Mr. Thom's sermons "A Spiritual Faith."

> I know not whether the warm welcome they received, especially at Mr. Rathbone's, of Greenbank—that house of refuge for all the saints—set their hearts aglow; but certain it is that their benevolent and devout enthusiasm came upon us like the Angel descending to stir the sleeping waters; and their recital of what was being done to uplift and evangelise the neglected classes in Boston fell as a convicting and converting word, and yet a word of hope and zeal, upon our conscience, and not least on that of Mr. Thom.

On Christmas Day, in 1835, Mr. Thom preached the sermon, out of which sprang the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society, definitely established on the following Good Friday, and of which John Johns, who wrote "Come, Kingdom of our God," was the first minister, and the first martyr, laying down his life in 1847 in the service of the fever-stricken poor. From the first establishment of that Society Dr. Martineau and Mr. Thom were the most powerful and persuasive advocates of the cause, which they felt to be at the very heart of Christian faithfulness in the churches, and to the last they maintained their warm interest in the work. It was Dr. Martineau who presided in 1885 at the fiftieth annual meeting of the London Society, while in the following year, at the Liverpool meeting, Mr. Thom made a wonderful speech, recalling the early days of the Society and the memory of its first minister. Mr. Thom's last public appearance was at the opening of the new Mission buildings in Mill-street, Liverpool, in 1892.

It was not only in Liverpool that Tuckerman's presence kindled the flame of a fresh zeal. At Bristol also, it was he who opened the new path of Christian service to Mary Carpenter, who threw herself in 1835 into the work of the Home Visiting Society in connection with Lewin's Mead, while three years later a Domestic Mission was established. In Birmingham, Leeds, and other towns, similar work was also taken up.

The work of these Missions can never be fully recorded, but enough is known to prove that in them humble and devoted followers of the Master have given their lives to the service of their fellow-men, with no sensational methods, simply going about doing good, and have lifted up many a forlorn soul from the depths of despair, and have rescued the perishing from the worst degradation, and have brought sheltering and cleansing and uplifting influences to bear upon some of the worst and most forsaken quarters of our great cities.

The Mission of Unitarian Zeal.

A contrast is sometimes drawn between the self-forgetting labour of Domestic Missions, with their single aim of ministering to the neglected poor, and the efforts of other missionary associations to spread the knowledge of Unitarian Christianity, and to establish new churches in which such teaching may prevail, as though these latter sprang from a lower and more selfish denominational spirit. But really it is the same spirit, the desire to share the best gifts with others, which is at the heart of both kinds of activity. It is, no doubt, true that denominational zeal may degenerate into something ignoble, thinking more of the advancement of a sect than of the Kingdom of God, and that theological controversy may be so carried on as not to help, but to hinder the spread of true religion; but, on the other hand, it is also true that there have been the most absolutely unselfish and devoted labours directed to the spread of what is felt to be the simplest and most helpful form of Christian truth and the endeavour to gather together companies of single-hearted worshippers in the light of that truth.

In the various missionary societies which sprang up about the middle of the century, such as the London District Unitarian Society, the Manchester District Unitarian Association, the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes, the Midland Christian Union, and the Liverpool District Missionary Association, there were doubtless differences of administration and of emphasis on the theological and the religious aspects of the work, but in all of them could be found men inspired simply by the desire to extend the influence of genuine religion and to share with others the gifts of spiritual freedom and a living faith which they had found in their own churches. Many of those who threw themselves most ardently into such missionary work were men who had themselves found deliverance from some painful bondage of old beliefs, and were thus eager to carry the glad tidings of emancipation and new hope to other crampt and darkened hearts; while others, born into that inheritance, were possessed by the clear and earnest conviction that they had no right to rest in the enjoyment of what meant so much to them for the strengthening, uplifting, and enlightening of life, without doing all that lay in their power to spread the light and establish new centres where it might be cherished and go forth to minister to others' needs.

With the broadening of thought in other churches there might seem to be less occasion now for that special kind of effort in the matter of religious belief, and yet the experience of Postal Mission workers tells another tale. It is hardly twenty years since Sallie Ellis, of Cincinnatti, "the Little Mother of the Post-office Mission," in her eagerness to be of service found that new way of missionary helpfulness opening to her. She was the first to show how much could be done by the sending of books and papers through the post, and by regular correspondence with those seeking light or needing religious encouragement, but her example was quickly followed, and now both in America and in this country and elsewhere, a large number of capable and devoted women are engaged in this quiet and most beneficent ministry, the branches of which, though unobserved of the world, extend to every quarter of the globe. Their testimony shows how widespread is the hunger for a more reasonable faith, and how eager the welcome to the light which Unitarian teaching can give, and to the offer of religious sympathy and fellowship, from which correspondents in uncongenial surroundings had long been entirely cut off.

But even supposing the work of theological enlightenment to be practically done, and there was harmony in all Christian churches as to the broad lines of truth and the right emphasis of teaching, there would still be as much as ever need for all the churches of the land, and for our Free Churches as much as any. For any work of special theological teaching, which in the past (and in the present) may have meant inevitable separation from other churches and sometimes antagonism towards their teaching, was not an end in itself, but only the necessary means for opening a free way for the fullest growth and exercise of the religious spirit, for the true life of the human soul with God and the truest fellowship of human brotherhood in worship and in work for the Kingdom of God on earth. This becomes more clearly than ever the great end of all the churches as they are able to forget theological differences in prayer and helpful service.

While, therefore, as Unitarians we are as deeply convinced as ever of the need of our witness to truth, it must always be with that further thought of the perfecting of truth in love, which must be the life of our churches. That is the great motive force, which will lead us right in all the work of our churches and in all efforts to extend the range of their influence for good.

In the year 1859 the Rev. John Hamilton Thom preached a sermon in Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, which was published with the title: "A Religion, not a Theology, the Want of the Times. A Plea for the Missionary Project of the Provincial Assembly of English Presbyterians in Lancashire and Cheshire." It was the sermon which was followed by the formation of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and was a powerful appeal for faith and self-forgetting in taking the message of religion to the people. It concluded with these words :—

What are the reasons that liberal, spiritual Christianity has so feebly connected itself with Foreign Missions I will not now inquire. It is possible that causes might be discovered not discreditable to our zeal—but we may satisfy ourselves of this truth—that a contracted sphere of operation implies a languid centre, an unenterprising soul—that a Church that has not faith enough to set its heart, and stake its fortunes, on great deeds of love, will never provide a Religion for Human Nature—will never be acknowledged by any large number of men as their nursing Mother, their highest encourager on earth of the endeavours which God's Spirit prompts—and that when it has served its temporary purpose, it must pass away, and yield its place to some nobler representative of Christ. Any Church must perish, and deserves to perish, that does not occupy the hearts of its disciples with great projects. It dies because it does not ennoble men's lives, nor employ their energies, nor feed the highest of all appetites, the hunger and thirst of the soul for service and sacrifice.

The Open Future.

Those are searching words by which we shall do well to test the work and the aspirations of our religious community.

It is a great enterprise to which we are called, which may well command the noblest energies of earnest men and women, and afford in fullest measure the opportunity for self-sacrificing service. Our Free Churches are few in number, but they have a clear calling to the highest service of God and man. As old antagonisms die away and the broad light of truth spreads far and wide, they have the happy consciousness that many others are labouring in the same field, and possibly with richer blessing to the world. Yet they must be true to their own truth, not with self-assertion, but in utter loyalty to God and the revealing of His Spirit; eager to learn of all who have some fuller light to give, yet humbly convinced that their own best service is in speaking their own word, living out their own life, and doing in full measure the work which it is clearly their duty to do.

Our Churches are clearly called to bear witness to the principle of spiritual freedom in religious fellowship, not shrinking from the demand for perpetual vigilance which is the price of freedom, proving it to be not self-will or carelessness of truth, but the profoundest reverence and faith, committed simply to the care of the Eternal, the Spirit of all truth.

On that foundation they are no less clearly called to prove themselves Christian Churches, by being Christian; by more living utterance and more perfect service, not by dogmatic insistence, but by the contagion of truth and goodness. It is theirs to show that the spirit of life in Christ Jesus lives in the air of freedom as the purest and loftiest spirit of our common humanity, most perfectly uniting men as brethren, and children of the one Eternal Father.

In such testimony is involved all the joy of self-surrender and self-abandonment in declaring the word of God, in ministering to all human needs, in works of beneficence and loving kindness, embracing the whole of human life in the one ideal of the Kingdom of God, striving for the coming of that Kingdom, living already in its spirit. In our Free Churches we are called to this high service, in the greater fellowship of all Churches which look up to the same light and strive for the same great end. It is for us to go forward into the new time committing the untried way to God, with the prayer that our word and our work may be His, and that in all Churches there may be renewed consecration to the holiest service, a more perfect Christian brotherhood, and growing unity of spirit in the bond of peace.

HENRY BARROW, SEPARATIST.*

Two doctrines of the Church have struggled for supremacy. One is inclusive, the other exclusive. One includes all the baptised; the other excludes all but the converted, the saved, the saints.

In the reign of Elizabeth the former doctrine held sway. It was the only possible policy, and policy rather than conviction of its truth may have moved many who supported it. But there were some who passionately protested. An inclusive Church which embraced whole parishes and a whole nation was in their eyes an abomination, they loathed it, and sought their ideal in a gathered Church, a Communion of Saints. Bonds and imprisonment in filthy dungeons did not shake the conviction of these men, nor did it improve their temper. It made them narrower, and tinged them with a fierce fanaticism which is not attractive, but for which due allowances must be made. A leader of this group of Separatists was Henry Barrow. He was of a good family—"after the manner of our country a gentleman." He had graduated at Cambridge, had been of Gray's Inn some years, and a hanger-on at the Court of Elizabeth, when the tenour of his life was changed by a voice. It was the voice of a preacher, "very loud," from a church which Barrow was passing with a companion. "Upon which Mr. Barrow said unto his consort, 'Let us go in and hear what this man saith that is thus earnest.' 'Tush,' saith the other; 'what! shall we go to hear a man talk?' But in he (Barrow) went, and sat down," and came out a changed man. So that "he made a leap from a vain and libertine youth to a preciseness in the highest degree, the strangeness of which alteration made him very much spoken of." From this stage of Puritanism he was induced, Dr. Powicke conjectures, by his friend Greenwood, to take a much more perilous step, the step into Separatism; and Greenwood having been arrested, Barrow was seized when on a visit to him. This was in 1586, and the rest of his life was passed in prisons of more or less loathsomeness, till, after being twice reprieved, he was hanged with his friend Greenwood. And they made "a very godly end, and prayed for her Majesty and the State."

It is a sad record, but the times were unsettled, and men like Barrow were "dangerous to the State." A man who could advocate not only the immediate disestablishment and disendowment of the Church, but also the destruction of all the parish churches and cathedrals in the country, was hardly safe to be at large. We may well shudder to think what England would be now if this insane project had been carried out. That Barrow "afterwards came to see somewhat differently" does not excuse it.

There are many things which he would doubtless have come to see differently if he had viewed them from the world instead of from a prison cell. His conception of the Church is the notion of a mere theoriser rather than of a great Churchman. Dr. Powicke, though himself a convinced Congregationalist, has not failed to expose some of the weak points in Barrow's position, such, for example, as his utterly groundless assertion that a detailed model of the true Church is to be found in the Scriptures. But when in his interesting Introduction Dr. Powicke contends that there should be no distinction between the Church visible and invisible he is by no means clear.

Moreover [he says] this Church though ideal is not invisible—is not what is known as "the Church mystical," "the mystical body of Christ," which cannot be distinguished or reckoned up or circumscribed by man. He (Barrow) rightly held that the distinction between visible and invisible has no New Testament support, and did not emerge until the Church, having corrupted itself, sought an excuse for its degraded state and for the continuance of it.*

How a Church can be ideal, that is, existing in idea, and at the same time visible is difficult to understand. Whether the distinction between visible and invisible has New Testament support or not, common sense would compel a man to make it, and if Barrow acknowledged no such distinction, why did he write "A True Description of the Visible Church," in which he says, "This congregation, as it is universally understood, containeth in it all the elect of God that have been, are, or shall be"? Can this be distinguished, or reckoned up or circumscribed by man? "But"—adds Barrow—"being considered more particularly as it is seen in this present world, it consisteth of a company and fellowship of faithful and holy people gathered in the name of Jesus Christ," &c.† This surely is a plain statement of the distinction between the visible and invisible Church. The visible Church is the Church "as it is seen in this present world." The rest of the Church, consisting of the elect that have been, some of those that are, and all that shall be, is invisible in this present world.

On the subject of baptism Barrow was weak and inconsistent. He strongly and rightly insisted on the importance of it; but, against the decision of the Catholic Church, he insisted that it could only be validly administered by a properly ordained ministry, and as he regarded both Roman Catholic and Anglican orders as spurious, this was to deny the validity not only of his own baptism, but of the baptism of all his countrymen and countrywomen, including that of the Queen. Must they, then, all be rebaptised? No, for that would be to play into the hands of the Anabaptists whom Barrow hated. So the dilemma was left. "He was forced into an untenable compromise."

Another "spot and wrinkle" on the Separatist Church according to Barrow's ideal is its uselessness. It appears as end rather than as means. To save the lost, to minister to the least and lowest is not its concern. So Calvinism with its creeping paralysis inoculated the Church.

* "Henry Barrow, Separatist, 1550?-1593, and The Exiled Church of Amsterdam, 1593-1622." By Fred. J. Powicke, Ph.D. James Clarke and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

The Amsterdam Church.

Part II. of Dr. Powicke's valuable work is devoted to "The Amsterdam Church." "The Amsterdam Church—humanly speaking—was built on Barrow. In the main it faithfully accepted and practised his view." Alas for the result! First this model church was convulsed over the "vain apparel" of the pastor's good lady, Mistress Johnson. She "wore three, four, or five gold rings at once." Moreover, "her busks and her whalebones in her breast were so manifest that many of the saints were grieved."

This was in London, but in Amsterdam the same contention was revived, till Francis Johnson, the pastor, "took a firm stand," and, threatening to go if his wife "could not wear what she had," the majority expelled his brother who had brought the accusation.

Eventually the pastor was under the painful necessity of excommunicating his own father, who, it appears, had come to take the part of the expelled George.

Thus things went on, a good deal of the old Adam manifesting itself in this Communion of Saints, "so that there was much occasion for scoffing and blaspheming given to unsympathetic outsiders." Poor outsiders, not elect, not saints at all, one can forgive a little scoffing!

It is a significant fact that what remained of the Church which was founded upon Barrow's theories was eventually "merged in the Scotch Presbyterian Church." So, tried by the facts of human nature, Barrow's theories were found wanting; but for the story of his life and death, and for a fair and candid description of his persecutors and opponents, we are grateful to Dr. Powicke, who may be congratulated on having made a very valuable addition to the literature of the origins of Congregationalism.

These origins have caused not a little perplexity since Rapin confessed that after the utmost pains he could not discover the origin of the sect. Dr. Powicke admits that so far as new facts are concerned his labours have not quite answered expectations; but the modest claim of "correction of some errors and clearer arrangement" will be gratefully accorded to him. He is inclined to doubt the possible personal influence of Browne on Barrow, thinking that what there was of it came indirectly through his friend Greenwood, who was at Cambridge when Browne re-appeared there between 1578 and 1580. Barrow's and Greenwood's repudiation of Browne seems to be partly due to their dislike of the term Brownist, a dislike increased by the fact of Browne's "Apostasy." Amongst the errors which Dr. Powicke has corrected may be mentioned his refutation of the theory that Barrow could have been "Marprelate," and his not too severe indictment of Professor Arber's inaccuracies.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

At the End of a Century.

You who are children now will like to remember when you are grown up and begin to tell the stories of long ago, that you were among those who saw the old Nineteenth century pass away and the new Twentieth century begin. None of us were alive when this century, which comes to an end at midnight on Monday next, began with Jan. 1, 1801, but many of us have known people who were, and I think now especially of my dear grandmother, who was a little girl of eleven then, and lived to be more than ninety. In an old churchyard there is a grave-stone, which tells us that her grandfather was born quite early in the century before, that is, nearly two hundred years ago. Then, if we go back another hundred years, we come to the time just before the poet Milton was born (in 1608), and again another hundred years, and we are in the England of Henry VII., when people had just learnt how to print books, and it was only a few years since William Caxton died, who set up the first printing press at Westminster. That is four hundred years ago, and so we might go back one century after another. In just a thousand years we should come to the time of the death of that noble English King, Alfred the Great, and then in another nine hundred years, nineteen centuries altogether, to the time of the birth of Jesus, from which we count our years and our centuries.

But even then we might go on counting back one century after another, until we were lost in the dim past of which we know nothing; and again we may look forward, and think of the end of the new Twentieth century, and so go on and on, but then we should be lost directly, for we do not know what it will be like even at the end of one hundred years from now. What we do know is that we can learn the lessons which the past has to teach us, and we must learn to be wise and brave and true, so that we may help to make the new century the best that there has ever been.

And there is one other thing we know. We look back over all these hundreds of years, and forward into the dim, far off time to come, when our own lives will have been ended long ago and others will be here of whom we know nothing. We think of all the changes that have been and will be, and of those dear ones who have gone before us, and we remember that there is One who does not change or pass away. We trust now in God, and are happy in the thought of His great love; our fathers trusted in Him, and more than two thousand years ago the old Psalmist said of Him, that "His mercy endureth for ever." The real reason why we count our time from the coming of Jesus into the world, is that he is the one teacher who most of all has made men sure of that great love of God, and has taught us to trust in Him as our heavenly Father. So we are not afraid of the unknown time which is coming; we are not afraid for those who are taken from us, nor for ourselves when we shall be called away, because always we shall be safe in our Father's care. The more we learn to be brave and true in the life we have to live here, the more certain we are of that.

There is a beautiful story from early English history, which I should like you to think of now. It was nearly thirteen centuries ago, three hundred years before the time of Alfred the Great, when Christianity was first being preached to the English, who were heathen when they conquered the Britons and settled in this country. We sometimes speak of them as Saxons in that early time, East Saxons and West Saxons, and others, for they were not yet one people ruled by one king. The King of Kent was the first to become a Christian, through the preaching of Augustine. Then when a daughter of the Kentish King went up to the north, to be the wife of Edwin, King of Northumbria, she took Paulinus with her, who was one of Augustine's companions, to persuade the men of the north country to become Christians too.

The story goes that after Paulinus had explained to the king and his chief people what Christianity was, one of the old men in the counsel turned to the king and said: "So seems the life of man, O king, as a sparrow's flight through the hall when you are setting at meat in wintertide, with the warm fire lighted on the hearth, but the icy rain-storm without. The sparrow flies in at one door, and tarries for a moment in the light and heat of the hearth-fire, and then flying forth from the other vanishes into the wintry darkness whence it came. So tarries for a moment the life of man in our sight, but what is before it, what after it, we know not. If this new teaching tells us aught certainly of these, let us follow it." The king and his wise men were persuaded, and became Christians; and the story comes down to us, making a beautiful picture, in the old man's words, to show in a parable all the comfort and gladness given to those who come to understand the Christian Gospel. We do not think of it just as Paulinus did, but the great truth which he made those Northumbrians feel has always been the same, and it is what we feel to-day.

It is the great truth of the love of God, our Father, and His unchanging goodness, which Jesus taught. It makes light and gladness in all the dark places. We are no longer afraid, and like the bird flying out from the warm bright hall into the cold night, when we think of the dim past and the unknown future, for the light of God's love goes with us wherever we go; we are His children and must always be safe in His care. This is why Christmas is such a happy time, because it brings us so clearly into the light and warmth of that love, which we learn to understand best when we share with Jesus the secret of unselfish love. And we could not have any better preparation for a new year or a new century. Let us always trust in our Father's love, and know that wherever we may be, that love will make home for us and for all whom we love. Only remember, that if we want to have this great happiness of being in our Father's Home, and not be ashamed and afraid when we think of Him, we must learn to be brave and true, loving and unselfish, as Jesus was, and glad to do our Father's will.

OUR REST IN THE ETERNAL.

AT the end of a long life, as one looks into the face from which the light must soon fade away, and the moments swiftly pass with the ebbing strength, what words are there that can break that holy silence, or attempt to say all that with which the heart is so fully charged? Years of intimate knowledge and affection have given the perfect understanding which now only the silent look of love can express. And the hearts of those who watch are strengthened by the thought of all the richness of the life, which no gathering of mortal shadows can obscure, for it belongs to the things which are eternal, and this messenger from the unseen, whom we call Death, is but a quiet Friend, who leads into the nearer presence of GOD. The last hours of watching are, indeed, fraught with intense emotion, but it is with the deep assurance that such life passes onward, not only to welcome the dawning of the new day beyond our vision, but to remain here also an abiding presence, a hidden strength in other hearts that have known and loved, helping still to make the future better than the past.

Some such feeling as this, if indeed we have at all realised the earnestness of life, must we not have as we watch through the closing hours of a century? A great period of human history is drawing to a close; it bears with it so many precious lives, so much of our own life; it has meant so much to us, it means so much, with its hidden treasures, with its potent forces working still in the world, judging, reproving, quickening, determining so much of our discipline, furnishing so much of our inspiration. But what words are sufficient at such a time? Is not silence better? At least we do well to lift up our hearts to the Eternal, to remember in whom we trust, and with the prayer of complete surrender to commit ourselves to His keeping, whose mercy endureth for ever.

As we watch for the coming of the new time it is with the sense that we take with us rich treasures from the past, and we may well strengthen our hearts with the thought of the best that has been given to us, to confirm our faith in the unseen things which are eternal. And here, rather than add more words of our own, we will recall some of the great words of the century, which belong to the imperishable treasures of our deeper life.

For those to whom it is our privilege specially to speak, in our own religious community, the passing century, in all that makes the sacredness of life, must be most closely linked with the memory of Dr. MARTINEAU. Almost the whole of the century was covered by his long life, and only this year has his visible presence been taken from us. If any speak to us at this time, he must be of the number, and it will be seen with what perfect fitness his words follow those of the great poets, which we will first recall.

It is a coincidence pleasant to remember, that in the year 1805, in which JAMES MARTINEAU was born, WORDSWORTH wrote his "Ode to Duty," giving to the English people one of the noblest utterances of that fundamental faith in righteousness, of which afterwards MARTINEAU was to be the great interpreter.

Stern Daughter of the Voice of God!
O Duty! if that name thou love
Who art a light to guide, a rod
To check the erring, and reprove;
Thou, who art victory and law
When empty terrors overawe;
From vain temptations dost set free,
And calm'st the weary strife of frail humanity!

. . . . . .

Stern Lawgiver! yet thou dost wear
The Godhead's most benignant grace;
Nor know we anything so fair
As is the smile upon thy face:
Flowers laugh before thee on their beds,
And fragrance in thy footing treads;
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong;
And the most ancient heavens, through Thee, are fresh and strong.

To humbler functions, awful Power!
I call thee: I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour;
Oh, let my weakness have an end!
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice;
The confidence of reason give;
And in the light of truth thy bondman let me live!

To the same period belongs WORDSWORTH's ode on "Intimations of Immortality," which expresses so much of the sense of the deeper meaning and spiritual kinship of our life.

Hence, in a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

Of a later generation TENNYSON and BROWNING are among the seers, who speak to us the most searching and most helpful words. Few stronger words of faith in the Eternal have been spoken in our century than BROWNING'S lines in "Abt Vogler":—

Therefore to whom turn I but to thee, the ineffable Name?
Builder and maker thou, of houses not made with hands!
What, have fear of change from thee who art ever the same?
Doubt that thy power can fill the heart that thy power expands?
There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound;
What was good shall be good, with, for evil, so much good more;
On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round.

All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist;
Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty, nor good, nor power
Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist
When eternity affirms the conception of an hour.
The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,
The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,
Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard;
Enough that he heard it once: we shall hear it by-and-by.

And what is our failure here but a triumph's evidence
For the fulness of the days? Have we withered or agonised?
Why else was the pause prolonged but that singing might issue thence?
Why rushed the discords in but that harmony should be prized?
Sorrow is hard to bear, and doubt is slow to clear,
Each sufferer says his say, his scheme of the weal and woe:
But God has a few of us whom he whispers in the ear;
The rest may reason and welcome: 'tis we musicians know.

To this, remembering the time, it might seem natural to add TENNYSON'S most familiar ode to the dying year, from "In Memoriam," a poem, with its noble aspiration, linked in so many homes with the most sacred memories of the last hours of the year. But indeed all the latter part of "In Memoriam" is good to be recalled at this time, and we will rather print here the closing stanzas:—

O Living will that shalt endure,
When all that seems shall suffer shock,
Rise in the spiritual rock,
Flow thro' our deeds and make them pure,
That we may lift from out of dust
A voice as unto Him that hears,
A cry above the conquer'd years
To one that with us works, and trust,

With faith that comes of self-control,
The truths that never can be proved
Until we close with all we loved,
And all we flow from, soul in soul.

And finally this passage, which concludes the first volume of Dr. MARTINEAU's "Hours of Thought," a passage which we quoted earlier in the year, at the time of his passing from our midst, as specially characteristic of his spirit and among the most beautiful utterances of his faith. In such companionship, with a thankfulness beyond words, we are more than content to pass onward into the new time, or, if it is to be, to that other shore from which the voices of these our teachers now come back to us, bidding us be of a good courage, and, resting in the safe keeping of the Eternal Goodness, evermore to rejoice.

REST IN THE LORD.

In him alone, but in him for ever, there is Rest. In evil days, when just men strive in vain to beat back the hosts of wrong, and mad tyrannies gall the heart with shouts of triumph, the Sentinel of every world is on his sleepless watch, and knows how to protect it from surprise. He is the continuous thread of all our years, and his love throws in each pattern of beauty woven into their texture: and when the images of the past, the distant fields, the dear abode, the gracious forms, the vivid hopes, the earnest heroisms, of our young days, gleam with a fairer light through the sorrows and failures of maturity, it is his breathing spirit that dissipates the cloud of time, and sends his reviving sunshine through. Only let us be at one with him, and our life gathers down upon it the strength of his infinite serenity. The simple thought, that "God is here"—that the august Ordainer of our trust and supporter of our faithfulness is present in the very hiding-places of the soul—contains within it the most powerful agencies of religion. Warning, sympathy and rest are treasured in it to inexhaustible amount. Amid the fatigues of life's incessant struggle, under the sense that we can never sleep or all things will go wrong, refreshment is instantly gained when we ascend to the fountain of all affection, and touch the parching lips with the draft of life. In temptations to unfaithfulness witnessed by no human eye, let us but say, "Ah! Lord, but thou art here," and the failing purpose springs to its feet again. And under the encroachments of fretfulness or despondency from the frequent perverseness of men, what can so soon check the hasty thought, soothe the unquiet passion, and put a music of patience into the soul, as the look of that pure and loving eye from its depth of infinite calm? In the trembling of age and the stealthy approaches of the last sleep, the dear presence of an Almighty Guardian, to whom age is as childhood and who unites the future with the past, fills the deepening shadows with a mild and holy light. Let him only be near; and the obscuring veil of mortal ill that sometimes seems to shut us in, and tempts us to believe in nothing but the sad rain, is soon withdrawn, like the cloud lifting itself from out the glen; and the sunshine first glorifies, then dissipates the haze; leaving the mountain-range of immovable goodness and beauty clear against the everlasting sky. So pass the storms away, so deepens the heavenly view, to the soul that will but "rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him."

PRAYERS FROM DR. MARTINEAU.

O God, who art, and wast, and art to come, before whose face the generations rise and pass away; age after age the living seek thee, and find that of thy faithfulness there is no end. Our fathers in their pilgrimage walked by thy guidance, and rested on thy compassion: still to their children be thou the cloud by day, the fire by night. Where but in thee have we a covert from the storm or shadow from the heat of life? In our manifold temptations, thou alone knowest and art ever nigh: in sorrow, thy pity revives the fainting soul: in our prosperity and ease, it is thy Spirit only that can wean us from our pride and keep us low. O Thou, sole Source of peace and righteousness! take now the veil from every heart; and join us in one communion with thy prophets and saints who have trusted in thee, and were not ashamed. Not of our worthiness, but of thy tender mercy, hear our prayer. AMEN.

O Lord of every world, before whom stand the spirits of the living and the dead! Thousands praise thee with a voice from which mortal sadness hath passed away. Prepare us to follow their upward track, and join their glorious hymn. And while we watch yet one hour here, whether in the retreats of sorrow or on the mount of vision, may we feel the great communion of the faithful of all ages gathered round our souls. And hence may we carry a fresh sanctity and order into our homes; modest desires and pure integrity into the world; forbearance to the wayward; help to the weak; pity to the burdened and afflicted; hope to the fearful; and charity to all men.

Thou art the God of future years. We leave them, with their treasures and their secrets, at thy feet. When our time is past, may our children serve thee with higher faith and nobler hearts. And so long as a generation shall seek thee here, may the careless be awakened, the faithful confirmed, the mourner comforted, and the pure in heart be brought to see their God. May age be filled with cheerful hope, and the hand of Christ shed its blessing on the child. Hear us in thy mercy, O Father Everlasting; and bid thy glory dwell among us, while a heart remains to be filled with love and joy and peace. AMEN.

O Thou whose eye is over all the children of men, and who hast called them, by thy Prince of Peace, into a kingdom not of this world; send forth his spirit speedily into the dark places of our guilt and woe, and arm it with the piercing power of thy grace. May it reach the heart of every oppressor, and make arrogancy dumb before thee. Let it still the noise of our strife and the tumult of the people; put to shame the false idols of every mind; carry faith to the doubting; hope to the fearful, strength to the weak, light to the mourner; and more and more increase the pure in heart who see their God. Commit thy word, O Lord, to the lips of faithful men, or the free winds of thine invisible Providence, that soon the knowledge of thee may cover the earth, as the waters cover the channels of the deep. And so let thy kingdom come, and thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.

AMEN.

THEODORE PARKER.*

SOME twenty years ago it chanced that I was taking supper with the Rev. Charles Voysey at the house of a friend, and the conversation turned on Parker. We both praised him as a great preacher, and our host joined in with much approval. But it seemed to us that his commendations, however cordial, could scarcely be called discriminative. Then it transpired that he was praising the preacher of the City Temple, and that of Theodore he had never heard. I had a like experience in conversation with a literary man of some repute only the other day. I have been driven to the conclusion that one of the greatest preachers, orators, reformers and martyrs that America ever produced, is hardly known in this country outside the ranks of the Unitarians. This perhaps accounts for the fact that Mr. Chadwick's book has no English publisher, and that apparently it can only be got on this side by direct importation from the States.

It was a happy inspiration in Mr. Chadwick's bosom or some one else's that set him to add one more to the Lives of Theodore Parker. It is not merely by his bright literary gifts that he is qualified for the task, but by a sympathetic spirit and sympathetic experiences. It is no secret that the sweet-tempered Brooklyn preacher, like Parker before him, had a push for it to secure the collegiate training which he so well assimilated, and knows something of the poor scholar's youthful struggles. And his fine sympathy with many sorts of literature, his broad-minded religious position, and his hatred of oppression and wrong give him a key to Parker's inward personality and help him to draw his subject with life-like lineaments.

Moreover, we have arrived at the time when the conflicts in which Parker played his brilliant part are just passing from the personal memory of men into the impersonality of history. It is forty years since his body was buried in the Protestant cemetery at Florence. Mr. Chadwick remembers many of the men with whom he was engaged in struggle; yet, that memory is now sufficiently detached from the passionate emotions of the time for just judgment and kindly excuse as well as for deliberate reproof. So the scenes of the brave young prophet's battles are set before us full of life and vividness, without the reticence which twenty years ago was still obligatory, yet with the proportion and just judgment which are the proceeds of perspective and of time.

And the result of these favourable conditions is everything that we could desire. We have a Theodore Parker presented to us who strikes the imagination with singular power, a saint and hero achieving mighty things, a splendid servant of the Lord, and all the while a most human being, whom we long to know, to talk with and to listen to. The Theodore Parker whom the dying man had "planted in America" here lives and glows with radiant life.

There are many illuminating touches in the volume:—

The boy's religious education proceeded at an equal pace with the intellectual. As the last child of the family, his mother had more time for him than she had for the others in their quick succession. The neighbours said that she was "spiling that boy." In fact she was nourishing his heart with wholesome piety and endearing herself to him so much that every time in later years when he prayed to God as "Our Father and our Mother," as he often did, he added another flower to the wreath that twined her memory.—(P. 17.)

He tried hard to think himself as wicked as a stray Westminster Catechism seemed to make him out, but it was uphill work, and he soon gave it up. He knew that he was a good boy, trying to be a better one, and there was no place in his experience, from his childhood up, for any genuine "conviction of sin" as the underlying groundwork of his life, no place for a "conversion" of the kind demanded by the sterner sects.—(P. 18.)

The book traces the story of his ministry, with its ever expanding circles of religious influence, vividly but soberly describes his conflicts with the orthodox Unitarianism of the day, gives an account of his philosophy and theology, exhibits him as the great religious leader that he became, shows him wielding the sledge-hammer of his mighty power in the anti-slavery struggle, narrows down to the pathetic story of his ebbing strength and vain quest of health, and concludes with the appreciations left on record by his contemporaries, and the judicial and judicious estimate at which the biographer himself arrives.

Of the voracious reading of his early years we are told that his list of books read during 1836 numbers 320 volumes, and his plans for the coming year are so ambitious as to be dizzying to any ordinary mind. It is hard to find a principle of order in an agglomeration ranging from "Jacob Faithful" on the one hand, to "English State Trials" and "Roman Public Instruction" on the other.

Surely a record that would sorely have displeased his great contemporary and fellow-thinker, Emerson. And his output in sermon, speech, and letter was on the like astounding scale. "Baur," we are told, "must have made for Parker a bad quarter of an hour, for when Parker asked him how many hours a day he studied, he answered, 'Alas! only eighteen'; two or three more than Parker's maximum allowance." Remember, you young ministers who would scourge yourself to the like application, that Parker, despite his magnificent constitution, died at fifty, and that the world has lost all that ripeness and richness of testimony which he would have lavished upon it in the period from fifty years of age to seventy.

Parker had the defects of his high emotional quality. "Like all affectionate people, he thought in persons, and could with difficulty separate the opinion from the man." Hence much of the castigation he inflicted on the upholders of what seemed to him the false and the defenders of what seemed to him the wrong. He had no patience with the "peevish scolding at sin" which passed for orthodox, and over against "the church termagant" he set the church militant and the church triumphant.

But Parker was much more than the controversialist or even the reformer. Says Mr. Chadwick:—

I do not know of any other who believed so much, whose confidence was so robust, whose optimism was so undaunted by the facts that are not to be eluded or ignored. Here was his most characteristic quality. When I think of Theodore Parker, I think of this; not of his philosophy which was the convenient formula and explanation of his three-fold* faith and his habitual certainty; nor of his learning, though this was mainly the expression of his human sympathy—his interest in all human things; not even of his anti-slavery work, for this was but a single, albeit the highest illustration of his prophetic gift; not of these lesser heights, but of his genius for religion and his passion for its communication which outsoared them all.—(P. 220).

Mr. Chadwick, with other biographers, has been permitted to turn the pages of Parker's journal. "Often," he says:—

We feel that we have been admitted to a privacy too sacred for a stranger's feet. But the more we read, the more we honour and admire and love the man. The revelation is that of a man morbidly sensitive to the touch of other men's unkindness or ill-will, more sensitive to the touch of sympathy; quick to resent a hurt, but quicker to forgive; conscious of a great work to be done, not easily satisfied with the use that he has made of his great powers and opportunities; hampered by a body that might have served an idler well enough, but which often broke under the strain he put upon it; wholesome and sweet in his affections; enamoured with the beauty of the world; serving his conscience with indomitable courage and resolve; with a great enthusiasm for humanity and a consciousness of God that gave him absolute assurance of the good of life and the soul's immortality. —(P. 318.)

The final chapter of Mr. Chadwick's book, "After Death the Judgment," is rich in valuable discriminations, criticisms, and appreciations of Parker's thinking and teaching, showing how largely he anticipated modes of presentation of religious truth, which, then startlingly novel and heretical, have since been practically assimilated by Unitarians generally, and even by men in excellent repute of orthodoxy. And in his final sentences he thus sums up the man and his message to the world:—

Seen at this remove, his denials in comparison with his affirmations are an inappreciable amount. Nor can it be regarded as a distinction of small moment that, of all men in his time, or in his century, he was the most frank and fearless prophet of Christianity as the world's greatest natural religion, and of Religion as the most characteristic aspect of human life. We get the right measure of his importance when we recognise the transition to these points of view as fundamental to the religious evolution of the present time and his part in it as second to no other.—(P. 405.)

Of Frothingham's well-known "Life of Parker," Mr. Chadwick says:—

Much careful study has made it far more beautiful for me than it had been to my careless reading, and gladly would I sink this craft of mine if, by so doing, that might renew its course, and carry its rich freight to friendly and to alien men.—(P. 383.)

The praise is both generous and deserved. Yet I am glad that Mr. Chadwick has set his craft afloat. Its strong and graceful lines are built in a newer day, and will carry it swiftly to harbour in the hearts of many readers. He has advantages of knowledge and perspective which the older shipwright could not have. Should some rich man read these lines of mine—or even one not rich, but with a few pounds to spare—he could do no better thing than to make a New Year's gift of this volume to every minister among us under forty. It carries a cheery inspiration in its pages, and will give men new zeal and courage. There could be no brighter greeting from the dying to the dawning century. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

THE VALUE OF THE "OPEN TRUST."*

BY THE REV. WALTER LLOYD.

THE question whether a statement of doctrines should be included or not in the trust-deeds of chapels has been revived during the last twelvemonths, and I presume that is the reason why I have been asked to speak upon the subject at this Conference.

I shall give a brief historical account of the different forms of trusts, and then give my reasons for preferring the form which is called "open"—that is, which imposes no doctrinal restrictions upon ministers or congregations.

It is now generally admitted that during what is called the chapel-building period, from 1690 to 1715, practically all the trusts of the chapels were what it is the custom to call "open"; "they neither specified the sect to which they belonged, nor the doctrines which were to be preached" (Skeats). This practice was not confined to any one denomination; but whether the chapel was intended for Presbyterian, Independent, or Baptist Dissenters, or for all of them, the same general terms were used. It is, therefore, incorrect to speak of the "Presbyterian" principle of the open trust; if it can be called a principle at all, it was a Protestant Dissenting principle.

It is customary to say the chapels were "dedicated to the worship of God"—which, in a sense, they were; but in most of the trust deeds with which I am acquainted the expression does not occur. A common form is "for the use of Protestants dissenting from the Church of England meeting for divine (or religious) worship," or some variation of it.

But in some cases chapels existed for many years without any definite form

* An Address delivered at the Bicentenary of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, of trust, such, according to Sir Thomas Baker, was the case with Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and such was the case with Barton-street Chapel, Gloucester; these buildings were conveyed to members of the congregation, no use being expressly stated. The Gloucester deed says: "For such uses and in such manner as they, the said James Forbes, &c., shall from time to time limit, order, direct, or appoint." The York Trust is "for religious and well-disposed Christian people, now called Protestant Dissenters, from time to time to meet, and there hear religious worship on the Lord's Day and other days." And Mr. Manning tells us that the trust of the Upper Chapel more expressly says "for the worship and service of Almighty God."

As these are sufficient to illustrate the general practice, there is no need to produce further instances. It must be remembered that there is no question of the orthodoxy—generally Calvinistic—of the ministers and congregations who had the use of the property thus assigned to them.

The question naturally arises whether this "open" trust was adopted by intention or by accident. It has been asserted, in law courts and in the House of Commons, that it was by intention that these founders, though holding certain theological opinions themselves, deliberately refrained from binding their successors. Having won their own freedom, they decided to put no restraints upon the freedom of others.

There may have been that far-sighted love of religious liberty; but it does not follow that that was the reason why the trust deeds were drawn up in such general terms. It was not until the Toleration Act was passed that Dissenters were enabled to put property in trust for religious uses, and they then adopted such a form or forms as would suffice to effect the object they had in view. A conveyance, or general form of trust, was sufficient for this purpose, and accomplished all that the law permitted or required. That during the nineteenth century we have realised the value of these open trusts is another matter; but it is all the same to us, as Dr. Martineau once said, "whether they have come down to us by intentional transmission or ecclesiastical accident."

Nevertheless I should like to be able to think that these founders were as liberal and far-sighted as they are sometimes said to have been. And I do think it likely that in some cases, if it had been proposed to restrict ministers and congregations to the preaching and hearing certain doctrines, they would have rejected the proposal as an infringement of their own rights as well as those of their successors. When the first minister of the Gloucester congregation was on his deathbed, he wrote a long letter to his congregation, in which he besought his people "to beware of doctrinal errors as of other sins" and to "keep up the same way of worship." He reminded them that he had subscribed to the Articles of the Church of England, and that he accepted the Assembly's Confession and Catechism; but still he only gave his congregation an exhortation, and not an injunction. He said he hoped they would keep to the old way, and not that they must; but James Forbes was an Independent. Whatever motive influenced them, the fact remains that the early Dissenters did adopt a very general or open form of trust, the advantages of which have since been proved.

Coming to the next stage, we find that in the great majority of cases the Congregationalists of later date introduced a doctrinal schedule into their chapel trusts, for the purpose, we have been told, not of preventing changes of theological opinion, but only of preventing the property from falling into the hands of people who did not hold the same opinions as the founders. I speak of the Congregationalists because I know more about them than I do of other denominations, and because this question of doctrinal trusts is exercising them at the present time.

I have not been able to discover exactly when this practice originated, at which some people may be surprised; but I think the reason is that these trusts are disregarded, and trustees do not wish the conditions under which they hold the chapels to be made known. I myself have been refused the sight of a confessedly Calvinistic trust on this ground. That the concealment is a matter of policy is not my opinion alone. A Congregational minister who wrote to me during the present year, in reply to some remarks I had made upon the subject, said:—

> You are quite right in your strictures on the numerous cases where church buildings are held in violation of rigid dogmatic trusts. The Huddersfield case afforded abundant proofs that such trusts are still in full validity; and I fear the congregations are more numerous than one would care to reckon, which might be promptly evicted if two or three hyper-Calvinists were to take the matter in hand.

Dr. Amory Bradford, who gathered a great deal of useful information about the English Congregationalists for his interesting book, "The Pilgrim in Old England," seems to have fared little better than myself in his inquiries about doctrinal trusts, for he throws no light upon the date of their introduction, but he throws a strong light upon the cause of their adoption.

Some of them may have been created as a consequence of the Exeter Controversy, though I have no evidence of it; and between the Salters' Hall Conference and the rise of Unitarianism under Lindsey and Priestley, very few Dissenting chapels were built—it was the period of the "decay of the Dissenting interest," but with the spread of the Evangelical movement on the one hand, and the rise of Unitarianism on the other, chapels began to increase, and then the orthodox Dissenters introduced doctrinal clauses into their trust deeds in order to prevent future congregations lapsing into Unitarianism.

I said Dr. Bradford throws light upon this point. In New England as in Old England, the Churches were originally open, and doctrinal tests were unthought of. Dr. Bradford says:—

> The earliest Church that I have found to require public assent to its articles of faith was that of Fitchburg in 1808. Park Street, Boston, was organised in 1809 with a strict creed to which subscription was required from those desirous of entering its membership. In the years following nearly all the Churches which did not become Unitarian raised doctrinal fortifications around their doors, which it was fondly believed would be sufficiently strong to resist the invasion of heresy.

In Old England heresy has invaded many Dissenting congregations in spite of their fortifications, i.e., their doctrinal trust deeds, and that, I think, is the reason why we can learn so little about them. In the year 1876, five years before I joined the Unitarians, I wrote a letter in the Christian World on changes in theological opinion, and I asked what is to become of the antiquated trust deeds? And being young and innocent, I went on to say:—

> If it is impossible or illegal to modify the conditions under which churches and chapels are appropriated to set forth certain doctrines, and if honest trustees are compelled to stick to the letter of the trust deeds, then chapels and deeds and trustees will have to be left to decay while preachers and congregations find new arenas in which to worship and teach according to their convictions and in harmony with their nobler conceptions of God.

I have since found that trustees have solved the difficulty in another way, by simply locking up the documents or remaining ignorant and keeping others ignorant of their terms.

The practice of inserting doctrines in some form in trust deeds was also, I presume, encouraged by the action of the chapel-building societies, which required something of the kind from congregations to whom they gave pecuniary assistance.

Dr. Bradford said it was fondly believed that these fortifications would keep out heresy, but, as his words imply, they have failed to do so; they have only prevented the open avowal of it. At the present time the term "Evangelical" covers a multitude of opinions, and not a few heresies.

The introduction of doctrinal opinions in trust deeds creates a glaring inconsistency between the profession and practice of Dissenters.

A preliminary note to the Congregational Declaration of Faith and Order, 1833, says:—

> Disallowing the utility of creeds and articles of religion as a bond of union, and protesting against subscription to any human formularies as a term of communion, Congregationalists are willing to declare, for general information, what is commonly believed among them, reserving to every one the most perfect liberty of conscience.

"And so (to quote Dr. Bradford once more) there is the strange anomaly of Churches declining to be bound by a written creed, and yet having in the deeds of their property what is practically a creed of the strictest kind."

I cannot but think that these trusts act as a restraint upon freedom, even where they are virtually disregarded. While allowing considerable latitude trustees must feel that there are limits which they must not allow to be passed, and the knowledge that the instrument may be brought to light, and perhaps into a court of law, must make ministers and church officers more careful than otherwise they would be. In the case of a Calvinistic trust it appears to me that an Arminian minister has no more right in the pulpit than a Unitarian. Every advance in opinion is a breach of trust.

During the last half-century doctrinal trusts have been condemned by Congregationalists like Dr. W. R. Dale and J. Baldwin Brown, who recognised the mischievous principle which underlies them, and I believe that in recent years some Congregational Churches have been founded on an open trust. Recent correspondence in the Christian World has shown, however, that very few are prepared to go so far; but the President of the Congregational Union has just stated, at the Autumnal Meeting, that the question of modifying their trust deeds will have to be considered. I suggested to a Congregational correspondent that in order to get rid of the inconsistency of Free Churches being bound to teach or profess certain obsolete doctrines, they should seek for power to modify their trusts, either from Parliament or from the Charity Commissioners. He replied they would not care to do so "for obvious reasons," and expressed himself as willing to accept the "Apostles' Creed" as a via media between the open trust and the rigidly dogmatic trust deed, but he confessed he did not think his feelings on the subject would command general sympathy.

The evil of these doctrinal trust-deeds —not the only one—is that they attempt to impose the opinions of the present upon future generations. Rapid and constant modification of doctrines, as a necessary consequence of growing knowledge, in a large measure, renders all such attempts futile; the object is an undesirable one, and the means not altogether a success. Private judgment will not be entirely overborne by parchment declarations; but they render its exercise difficult, and its expression almost impossible. When the utterance of truth is a breach of trust, truth is very likely to remain unspoken.

And, after all, the fear that an open dissenting trust will necessarily lead to Unitarianism is baseless. It is true that a number of congregations in old chapels with open trusts have become Unitarian; but it is also true that a larger number of congregations of the same class remain more or less orthodox.

I have said nothing so far about Unitarian trust deeds, because they are a thing of the past. Our principles forbid us to close the door upon the possible entrance of new and larger truth. No body of Christians has been so ready to welcome new truth as those who are called Unitarian. The Calvinists in many cases determined by their trusts that their property should never be used by any but Calvinists. The Unitarians, except in a few instances many years ago, have refrained from such a narrow policy. So far as I know, the Unitarian is the only body, which, as a body, has declared itself to be unreservedly in favour of the principle of the Open Trust.

All the objections which have been raised against Unitarian churches are only valid against the imposition of Unitarian creeds and trusts—attempting to fix our opinions in a documentary form upon future generations. We hope that the congregations will remain Unitarian, but we do not say they must. To call them Unitarian as long as they are so does not in any way fetter the freedom of future worshippers; for if, or when, they cease to be Unitarian we may take it for granted they will cease to call themselves so.

I have not, after all, said much about the value of the Open Trust, but I think what I have said has sufficiently demonstrated it. The Open Trust alone makes the Protestant Dissenting principle of the right of private judgment and liberty of conscience a reality. It does not take away with one hand what it professes to give with the other. It recognises that the present has no right to lay a burden upon the future; that those who come after us will have the same right as ourselves to think their own thoughts and use their own words when they try to understand or to utter the revelation of God which they may hear or see. The Open Trust casts off the weight of the "dead hand," which oppresses so many Churches, and sometimes makes truth an offence and its utterance a crime.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackpool: South Shore.—A Sale of Work on Dec. 18, opened by Councillor David Healey, of Heywood, Councillor James Bibby, of Burnley, in the chair, realised about £70. A congregational meeting on Dec. 20 decided to renew the engagement of the Rev. H. Bodell Smith for another year. On Dec. 26 the annual Christmas party was held, with a musical cantata and charade by children of the Sunday-school.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—A Sale of Work, promoted by the ladies of the Church Guild, to assist the current expenses of the church, was held in the new schoolroom on Thursday, Dec. 13. The sale was opened by Mrs. William Evans, of the Great Meeting congregation, and was largely attended. The result far exceeded expectations, £56 being realised, which will enable the treasurer to start the new year with a balance in hand. The new church building is now nearing completion, and will be opened in February or early March. A considerable sum of money is still required for the building fund, and donations will be gratefully received by the minister, treasurer, or secretary.

London: Forest-gate.—A successful Sale of Work was held lately at Upton-lane, and much congregational activity and good-will were evoked in connection therewith. The Ladies' Sewing Circle must be credited with the greater part of the result. A concert and dramatic entertainment, arranged and carried out by Mr. and Mrs. Fossey and friends, supplemented the sale.

Mansfield.—The Municipal Journal, of Dec. 21, contains a notice, with a portrait, of Mr. J. Harrop White, recently appointed Town Clerk of Mansfield. Mr. White was articled to Mr. Jesse Hind, of Nottingham, and since his return to Mansfield has been an active member of the Old Meeting congregation. From 1888 to 1896 Mr. White was a member of the Nottinghamshire County Council, and for the past six years has practically discharged the duties of the office to which he has now succeeded.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—The service on Sunday evening was largely musical, and the discourse of the Rev. W. Lindsay was on Handel's Messiah, selections from which had been rendered in the afternoon by the Nottingham Co-operative Choral Society and the choir of the church.

Oldham.—On Sunday, Dec. 23, a special musical service was held, when selections from the Messiah were rendered, interspersed with hymns sung by the congregation. The Rev. J. A. Pearson conducted the service. The collection of £3 13s. was for the chapel funds.

Taunton.—The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, although he has retired from the pastorate of Mary-street Chapel, has once more, before leaving Taunton, observed a good custom, and has addressed a letter of affectionate Christmas greeting and good wishes for the new year to the members of his old congregation. Mr. Worthington recalls the memories of his seventeen years of ministry among them, and concludes with an earnest prayer for the welfare of the congregation.

Wales: Mid-Cardigan.—The annual winter gathering of the Sunday-schools of Alltyplaca and Capelygroes was held at the former place on Christmas morning. Both schools recited one chapter each from the New Testament and were catechised by their respective ministers, the Revs. John Davies and David Evans. On the afternoon of the same day the Sunday-schools of Capelybryn and Sychbant met at Capelybryn. Each of these again recited a chapter of Scripture and were catechised by the minister, the Rev. J. Davies. All the schools did their work creditably, and on the whole the gatherings were fairly successful.
